INTRODUCTION

In an American publication entitled The Hundred, the author mentions the one hundred people he believes to have exerted the most significant influence on human history. The author, Dr Michael Hart, was born into a Christian family and received a scientific education. But at the top of his roll of honour, he has placed neither Christ's name nor Newton's. There was one person, he believes, whose achievements excelled all others: that person was the Prophet Muhammad. No one else has had such an impact on the history of man. "He was the only man in history," he writes, "supremely successful on both the religious and secular levels."<sup>1</sup>

Just as to the American Michael, Hart the Prophet is the most outstanding figure of human history, to the English historian Thomas Carlyle, he is "the hero of the Prophets."

In ancient times, when Abraham and Ishmael were building the House in Makkah, they prayed for a prophet among their descendants. Two thousand five hundred years later, this "hero," the Prophet Muhammad, arose from the People of Makkah, bringing with him special divine succour. The prayer of Abraham was fulfilled, and with it, the purpose of the prophets' coming to the world was achieved.

Before Muhammad, history did not carefully record the lives of the prophets. From a strictly academic and historical point of view, their prophethood was difficult to establish. The Prophet Jesus was the last of the ancient prophets and had a following of millions, yet so tenuous is his historical position that Bertrand Russell remarked: "Historically, it is quite doubtful whether Christ ever existed at all." This is not the case with the Prophet Muhammad, the last of the prophets. His life is so well-documented and laid down in history that anyone who studies his life is forced to agree with Professor Philip Hitti that "Muhammad was born in the full light of history."<sup>2</sup>

The factor that makes the most significant contribution to the permanence of Muhammad's prophethood is the Quran, that enduring miracle revealed to him by God. If this miracle had been of the same order as those bestowed upon his prophetic predecessors, its effects would not have outlived him, and his prophethood would not have been accepted in the way that it was by subsequent generations. A miracle is an extraordinary event that man, on his own, cannot produce. This definition applies in full measure to the Quran: it is beyond man even to emulate it. Therefore, there is no doubt that the Quran is a miracle wrought by the Almighty.

Muhammad's role was exceptional in that he was to be the last of the prophets. God had so ordained it. The final revelation of God's will was to be conveyed to the people by him, and, for posterity, the scriptures had to be preserved by him and subsequently by his devoted followers throughout the centuries. To ensure this train of events, the Prophet had to bring about a great revolution that would give him a world following.

Muhammad is the father of no man among you.
He is the Prophet of God and the last of the prophets. God knows all things.<sup>3</sup>

God chose the Prophet to give the kind of guidance to people they needed to lead good, virtuous lives. If people seemingly have complete control over what they do, it is because, in this world, they are on trial. If the illusion of free will causes them to act as they choose, they are being tested. Despite their divine mission, the Prophets cannot force people to change their ways. All they can do is communicate the message with which God has entrusted them:

Yet what should Messengers do but give plain warning?<sup>4</sup>

God has done the maximum to ensure that we should not go astray in our journey through life. He has given us a conscience, enabling us to differentiate between right and wrong, and has placed us in a justice-based world. But - whenever man has failed to listen to his conscience or was deaf to the silent message emanating from every object of God's creation, God sent His prophets to bring him the truth, and so that these God-sent messages should not be incomprehensible to the people of many different lands, they were communicated to them in their languages.

In pre-Islamic times religious institutions had become debased by the veneration of mere mortals, whereas the prophet Muhammad admitted no other form of religion but that based on the worship of the immortal God. Religious beliefs had frequently been founded on superstition, but by him, they were established on the foundation of reality. He taught people to conquer nature instead of worshipping it, thus paving the way for the scientific era. And where political power had been in the hands of one hereditary monarch, he showed the way to government by the people. While learning had been based on conjecture and assumption, he taught people to learn from observation of reality. In cases where human society had been vitiated by cruelty and oppression, he showed people how to live together in justice and peace. These are all achievements of the Prophet Muhammad. He changed the tide of human history.

From whatever angle one looks at history, ever-broadening reverberations of his impact will be manifest. All that is best in human values, all the important advances of human civilization, are direct or indirect results of the revolution he brought about.

His personal life was a perfect example for humanity. Because he was made to experience all kinds of exceptional conditions, he was able to provide a model for living both at the individual and social levels. He showed us the life that God would like us to live on earth, for in all matters, every one of his actions was by the will of God. Not only did he establish the perfect pattern for worshipping God, but he also showed how God helps those who truly devote their lives to His service. We can see from his life how if one fears God, there is nothing else one needs to fear. He will pour oil on troubled waters if one remains patient in the provocation. If one rises above negative impulses, one can win over everyone, even enemies. If one sacrifices this world for the next, one will eventually have the best of both worlds.

Just as the farmer who cultivates his land by divinely inspired methods reaps the best crop, so, at any time, can the followers of the Prophet prevail over others. God has provided all the conditions necessary for and conducive to the dominance of His divine religion. By understanding and utilizing them, adherents of this religion can bring Islamic thought into pre-eminence.

Between the time of the Prophet Abraham and the coming of the Prophet Muhammad, two thousand-five hundred years elapsed. Throughout this period, the stage was set for the arrival of the Prophet. The Prophet, acting at God's behest, played the role for which he was cast. That was why his mission was supremely successful.

In making the Prophet Muhammad the greatest figure, and, consequently, one of the most resplendent landmarks in human history, God has bestowed his greatest favour on humanity. Therefore, whoever seeks a guide for himself cannot fail to see him, for he stands out like a tower, a mountain on the horizon, radiating light like a beacon, beckoning all to the proper path. Therefore, it is inevitable that a seeker of truth will be drawn up to the magnificent pinnacle on which he stands.

During the fourteen hundred years that have passed since the times of the Prophet Muhammad, the historical changes that have occurred and the massive advances in human knowledge that have taken place have all combined in support of Islam. The religion that the Prophet taught can still take pride in place over other faiths. But, for this to be achieved, divinely-inspired methods must be adopted. This rule, which applied to the Prophet, equally applies to his followers.

PART ONE

FROM ADAM TO THE MESSIAH

All of the prophets who came into this world had an identical mission. They taught that man's life on earth was but an infinitesimal part of his eternal life.

In this world he was put to the test. Reward or punishment would come in the next world. After death, if he had followed the Lord's path, he would find his eternal abode in heaven. But, if he had strayed from it, he would be plunged straight into hell. His damnation would be everlasting. This was the reality of life taught by every one of the prophets.

Adam was the first man on earth and also the first prophet. A long line of prophets succeeded him right up to the time of the Messiah. Altogether there have been some 124,000 messengers of God, of whom 315 have been prophets. They appeared in different lands and among different peoples, preaching the word of God and exhorting people to live in fear of Him. But very few of those they addressed have ever proved willing to give up their freedom for the sake of God. Few people, for instance, followed the Prophet Yahya (John the Baptist), and he died a martyr's death. When Lot left his people, only two of his daughters accompanied him. According to the Old Testament, only eight people entered the ark along with Noah. When Abraham left his native country, Iraq, the only people to accompany him were his wife, Sarah and his nephew Lot, although they were later joined by his two sons, Ishmael and Isaac. Even after great missionary effort on the part of Jesus, the priests and religious authorities who heard his teachings did not follow him, and even his twelve friends temporarily forsook him at the moment of truth.

This was an unhappy lot of most of the prophets. The ties of kith and kin sometimes brought a handful of followers to the more fortunate, but as often as not, would-be prophets were forced by the inattention and insensitivity of those around them to live out their lives in solitude and persecution. This verse of the Quran aptly sums up common attitudes to prophethood throughout the history of humanity: "Alas for the servants! They laugh to scorn every prophet that comes to them."<sup>5</sup>

In God's sight, the prophets stand head and shoulders above the human race. It is extraordinary that they are the very ones to whom the least historical importance has been attached. History has exhaustively chronicled the lives of kings and soldiers, but not a single prophet's life has been given its due place in the annals of history. Aristotle (384-322 B.C.), born one thousand years after the Prophet Moses, was unfamiliar with Moses' name. The reason is not far to seek: most of the prophets were rejected by their peoples; their homes were demolished; they were treated as outcasts from society; they appeared so unimportant that no one deemed it necessary even to mention them.

Why were the prophets treated in this manner? One reason for this was their criticism of current practices, especially of the established religious authorities, the priesthood. People love being praised and loathe nothing more than being criticised. The prophets exposed the difference between right and wrong, making no compromise with their people. They were persistently pointing out the faults in people's beliefs and actions. Consequently, people turned against them. If the prophets had taught what everyone wanted to hear, they would never have been treated this way.

Although this was the fate of most of the prophets, a few of them were spared, Joseph, Solomon and David being names that immediately spring to mind. But the power and prestige these prophets acquired were not due to the popularity of their teachings; they had an entirely separate origin.

David was a young soldier in the army of the Israelites under King Saul when the Israelites and Philistines went to war with each other. Among the army of Philistines was the giant Goliath. So powerful a fighter was he that no one was prepared to battle with him. King Saul then announced he would marry his daughter to anyone who slew Goliath. David came forward, challenged the giant, and killed him. In this way, he became the son-in-law of the King of Israel. In a subsequent war, King Saul and his heir apparent were killed in battle. David was thereupon crowned King of Israel. Solomon was David's son and succeeded to his father's throne. As for Joseph, God endowed him with the ability to interpret dreams, and the King of Egypt, impressed by his power, went so far as to entrust state affairs to him. But the King remained head of state, and his subjects continued to adhere to their pagan religion.

This aggressive treatment meted out to the prophets throughout the ages deprived people of true guidance and, what was even more serious, made the preservation of the scriptures and teachings of the prophets impossible. Only a prophet's followers can preserve his teachings after him, but the prophets either had no followers or so few as to be unable to counter the challenges of their society to the preservation of the Holy Scriptures.

The knowledge of God is eternal. He sees the future just as He does the past. Before sending the prophets, he knew this would be the fate of the human race. So He decreed that He would remedy this situation at the end of the prophetic era by sending His special envoy to the world: a prophet whose task would be to preach religion and exalt it above all others on earth. God would grant him special succour, enabling him to convince his people to bow to the truth. God would keep him on earth until he had rectified the perversions of the society around him. God's might would assist the Prophet in vanquishing his opponents. In this way, true religion would be established on solid foundations, and God's word would be perpetuated, as it says in the Bible, "for the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of God, as the waters cover the sea."<sup>6</sup>

Translations and additions have taken the present-day Bible very far from the original. But it still contains multiple references to the coming of the Prophet Muhammad. If one studies the Bible objectively, one will find specific references that cannot be applied to anyone else. The mission of the Prophet Jesus was to announce to the world, and the Jewish nation in particular, the coming of the final prophet. The “New Testament” to which he referred was, in truth, Islam, for it marked the end of Jewish religious hegemony and projected the Children of Ishmael as the true recipients of the word of God. Hence the rise of the Prophet Muhammad.

The Prophet Jesus came to the world six hundred years before the last of the Prophets. In one reference to Jesus, the Quran has this to say:

And remember the Prophet Jesus, who said to the Children of Israel: “I am sent forth to you by God to confirm the Torah already revealed and to give news of an apostle that will come after me whose name is Ahmad.”<sup>7</sup>

“Ahmad” and “Muhammad” have the same meaning: the praised one. In the Gospel of Barnabas, the name of the coming prophet is given quite clearly as Muhammad. But since Christians consider the Gospel of Barnabas apocryphal, we do not think it proper to quote from that source. We cannot even be sure whether Jesus, in his prophecy, referred to Ahmad or Muhammad. Most probably, he used a word with the same meaning as these names.

In his biography of the Prophet, Ibn Hisham quotes the historian Muhammad ibn Ishaq, the most authentic source on the Prophet's life, as saying that when Jesus spoke in his mother tongue, Syrian, the word that he used of the coming prophet was "Munhamann" meaning "the praised one." This traditionally accepted appellation was probably passed on to him by Palestinian Christians who had come under Islamic rule. When the Bible was translated into Greek, the word became "Paraclete".

THE EMERGENCE AND LEGACY OF THE PROPHET MUHAMMAD

Poised between Africa, Asia and Europe, the Arabian Peninsula lay at the heart of the ancient world. Yet no ambitious conqueror had invaded the territory; no ruler had sought to bring it under his domain. All military campaigns had been limited to the area bordering Arabia—Iraq, Syria, Palestine and Lebanon. As for the Arabian Peninsula, no one had considered it worth fighting for. True, its shores were lapped by three seas, but its interior offered little beyond the inhospitable desert and barren mountains.

Makkah was the central township of this land; it was in this “uncultivable valley” in which it lay, that the Prophet of Islam, Muhammad, on whom be peace, was born. His father, ‘Abdullah ibn ‘Abdul Muttalib, died a few months before the birth of the Prophet. He was only six when his mother, Aminah, also passed away. For two years, he was cared for by his grandfather, ‘Abdul Muttalib, and when he too died, the Prophet’s uncle, Abu Talib, became his guardian. Abu Talib’s demise occurred three years before the emigration of the Prophet to Madinah. At the most difficult stage of his life, the Prophet was left without a protector. But nature had endowed the Prophet with a remarkable personality. Those who saw him in his youth said: “This boy has a great future.” His dignified and impressive personality grew with age. ‘Ali<sup>8</sup> once commented, “Those who saw him for the first time were filled with awe, and those who came close to him grew to love him.” The Prophet’s noble character was undisputed, yet people’s attitude to him changed when he announced his prophetic mission in his fortieth year. They poured scorn on his claim to prophethood. “Look at this village boy who reckons he’s in contact with the heavens,” they would say.

His preaching mission extended over a mere twenty-three years. During this short time, he brought about a revolution among the Arab tribes, the like of which the world had never seen. Within one hundred years, this revolution had vanquished both the Sassanian and the Byzantine Empires. With the fall of these two great empires, Islam annexed the territory extending from Iran and Iraq to Bukhara in the east, while in the west, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, and then the whole of North Africa also fell to Islam. And the torrent did not halt there. In A.D. 711, Islam surged across the Straits of Gibraltar into the Iberian Peninsula. In 732, a Frankish prince, Charles Martel, arrested the advance of Islam at Tours. Then followed the Crusades, stretching over two centuries, and after the Crusades, the horrific onslaughts of the Tartar tribes. But despite these attacks from the outside, the Islamic Empire held its own until the 15th century, when Spain was lost due to infighting among the Muslims.

It was then the turn of the Turks and the Mughals to be aroused by the spirit of Islam. In 1453 the Turks conquered Constantinople and advanced into Eastern Europe as far as Yugoslavia. A Turkish army remained encamped outside Vienna until 1683. In the 16th century, the Mughals established Islamic rule in India and Afghanistan. Over the last thirteen centuries, Muslims have spread to every corner of the globe. Close to four-dozen countries in Asia and Africa have come to constitute a Muslim world. According to the World Muslim Gazetteer<sup>9</sup> there are 900 million Muslims today.

This resulted from a twenty-three-year effort in Arabia under the Prophet's guidance. In this short time, the Islamic revolution not only assured itself of a permanent place in human history; but also created a new history of its own. Humans alone do not have it in them to accomplish such a gigantic task; God can only do it. The Islamic revolution was indeed the work of God. When the Muslims returned from their victory at the Battle of Badr, they were met at Rauha by some well-wishers, who congratulated them on the outcome of the fighting. "Why do you congratulate us?" asked Salmah ibn Salamah. "The enemy was like tethered camels, and we duly slaughtered them."<sup>10</sup>

All of this was evidently pre-ordained by God. From the bare Arabian Desert, He raised a people of extraordinary tenacity whose characters had been tempered by their environment. They knew only acceptance or denial; they had no third alternative. All the natural qualities needed for dedication to a cause were preserved in them. Added to this was the fact that the two great powers of the day lay on their country's borders. It was only natural that the mighty empires of Rome and Persia should not take kindly to the emergence of a new power on their doorstep. In their attempt to arrest the rise of Islam, they waged war against the Muslims. In so doing, they forced the Muslims to fight back. This allowed the Muslims to conquer the empires of Rome and Persia, whose borders, at that time, extended to the farthest reaches of the known world. There is no doubt that the conquests of Islam were not wars of aggression against others; instead, they were a response to aggression from others. They were wars of self-defence, and never, in any country, have there been two minds on the justification for such battles.

Over and above the political significance of these events was that the Islamic revolution opened out hitherto unexplored opportunities for humanity. It made God's revealed religion a historical reality, something that it had not been before.

It ushered in the age of the press, ensuring the preservation of the Quran for all time. It brought the age of democracy and freedom of speech to the world, removing all artificial barriers obstructing preachers in their call to truth. Finally, it made scientific discoveries possible, enabling religious truths to be proved and explained rationally and intellectually.

An even more important aspect of this revolution was that, through the Prophet, God showed the world what would happen in the hereafter. His life and mission provided us with a preview of the events of the next world. Those who accepted and patterned their lives upon the truth that he brought to them were made supreme, and that is how they will remain forever in the hereafter if God wills. The wicked, meanwhile, were made to taste the humiliation that they would forever be prey to in the world to come.

History shows that those who devote their lives to God always appear in a passive and depressed condition, while those devoted to wealth and power always seem to have their way in the world. Such is the sombre evidence of the history of saints and prophets. This state of affairs is quite contrary to reality, for, eventually, God will bestow everlasting honour and glory upon His faithful servants, while self-worshippers and worshippers of the world will forever be assigned to a pit of humiliation and disgrace.

This world is for our trial. Here, people have the chance to act as they please. That is why God does not hold anyone in check in this world. But once, at least, through the prophet of Islam, God has shown on earth the situation that will prevail in its most complete and permanent form in the next world.

The companions of the Prophet, whose homes were demolished, for whom the earth had become a place of unmitigated oppression, who were robbed of their properties, who were so victimized and terrorized that they lived in constant fear of extermination—these very people were raised to a position of great honour. The Quraysh and the Jews, the Romans and the Iranians, the Yemenis and the Ghassanis<sup>11</sup>—those who took pride in their wealth and power—were meanwhile reduced to ignominy and disgrace.

Every prophet who comes from God provides a criterion of divine justice. Through him, God announces to humanity the decisions He Himself will announce in the next world. But the Prophet of Islam gave such a display of divine justice that it became a world experience and an accepted historical reality. We could see with our own eyes how God honoured His faithful servants and degraded those who rebelled against Him. Of course, heaven and hell were realities that would be made manifest in the next world. But we had been given a preliminary glimpse of them in this world so that we might take heed.

What really emerged with the prophethood of Muhammad was the divinity of God Himself. That is why the New Testament foretells his prophethood as the “Kingdom of God.” Undoubtedly, the Prophet’s revolution had tremendous political and strategic implications. But its primary importance is as an earthly manifestation of God’s glory, a revelation of divine justice. The revolution of the Prophet Muhammad showed us in advance the realities that would come upon us in the stark and absolute form in the hereafter.

EXEMPLARY CONDUCT

The Prophet of Islam, Muhammad, upon whom be peace, was born in Arabia on 22 April A.D. 570 and died on 8 June A.D. 632. He was a very handsome and powerfully built man. His childhood indicated the sublime and dynamic personality that was to emerge. As he grew up, the nobility of his personality used to affect anyone beholding him, but he was so soft-spoken and of such a genial disposition that anyone coming into close contact with him would learn to love him. A perfectly balanced personality—tolerant, truthful, perspicacious and magnanimous—he presented the highest example of human nobility. According to Daud ibn Husayn, he became known as he grew older as the most chivalrous among his people, tolerant and forbearing, truthful and trustworthy, and always a good neighbour. He would stay aloof from all quarrels and quibbles and never indulged in foul utterances, abuse or invective. People even left their valuables in his custody, knowing he would never betray them. His unimpeachable trustworthiness won him the title of “al-Amin,” a faithful custodian, an unfailing trustee.

When he married at age twenty-five, his uncle Abu Talib performed the marriage service. “There is no one to compare with my nephew, Muhammad ibn ‘Abdullah,” he said. “He outshines everyone in nobility, gentility, eminence and wisdom. By God, he has a great future and will reach a very high station.” Abu Talib did not utter these words in the sense that later events proved them true. Instead, he meant them in a worldly sense. Nature had endowed his nephew with a magnetic and versatile personality. His people would surely appreciate his qualities and raise him to a high position. Abu Talib envisaged a future of worldly success and accomplishment for his nephew, the “great future” he referred to in his sermon.

Without a doubt, the Prophet had every opportunity for worldly advancement. He was born into a noble family in Makkah, and his virtues guaranteed his success in life. True, he had inherited just one camel and one servant from his father, but his inborn high qualities had impressed the wealthiest woman in Makkah, Khadijah, a forty-year-old widow from a merchant family. When the Prophet was twenty-five, she offered herself to him in marriage. Not only did marriage with Khadijah provide the Prophet with wealth and property, but it also opened a vast field of business to him in Arabia and beyond. The Prophet had every opportunity to lead a successful and comfortable life. But he forsook all these things and chose something entirely different for himself. Quite intentionally, he took a road that could lead only to worldly ruin. Before his marriage, the Prophet had earned his living in different ways. Now he relinquished all such activity and dedicated himself to his lifelong vocation—the pursuit of truth. He used to sit for hours and ponder over the mysteries of creation. Instead of socializing and trying to gain a position among the nobles of Makkah, he would wander in the hills and dales of the desert. Often he used to retire to the loneliness of a cave in Mount Hira'—three miles from Makkah—and stay there until his meagre supply of food and water was exhausted. He would return home to replenish his supplies and then go back to nature's solitude for prayer and meditation. He would beseech the Maker of the heavens and the earth for answers to the questions surging in his mind. What is our true role in life? What does the Lord require of us as His servants? Whence do we come, and whither will we go after death? Unable to find answers to these questions in the centres of human activity, he betook himself to the stillness of the desert; perhaps, there, the answer would be forthcoming.

The Romanian orientalist Konstan Virgil George (b. 1916) writes in his book, The Prophet of Islam:

Until one has spent some time in the wilds of Arabia and the Middle East, one cannot begin to understand how the vastness and tranquillity of the desert expand the human intellect and fortifies the imagination. There is a remarkable difference between European and Arabian plants. No plant in the arid reaches of the desert does not exude a sweet fragrance; even the acacia trees of this land are aromatic. The desert stretches for 3,000,000 square kilometres. Here it is as though man comes into direct contact with God. Other countries are like buildings in which massive walls obstruct one's view, but there is nothing blocking one's vision of reality in the vast open reaches of Arabia. Wherever one looks, one sees endless sands and fathomless sky. Here, there is nothing to stop one from consorting with God and His angels.<sup>12</sup>

It was no small matter that a young man should be taking up this course in the prime of his life. He renounced worldly happiness and chose a way fraught with difficulties and sorrow. He had all possible means and opportunities for a comfortable life, but his turbulent soul did not find satisfaction in them. He attached no value to them and could not rest content until he had unravelled the mysteries of life. He sought to delve beyond external appearances and seek out the reality of life. Worldly gain and loss, comfort and distress, did not concern him; what mattered to him was the all-important question of truth and falsehood.

This phase of the Prophet's life is referred to thus in the Quran:

Did he not find you wandering and guide you?<sup>13</sup>

The word used in this verse for "wandering" ("dhallan") can also be used to describe a tree standing alone in an empty desert. The Prophet was like a lone tree standing amidst the vast wilderness of ignorance that was Arabia of the time. The idea of consolidating his position in this society was abhorrent to him. He sought the truth, and nothing less than the truth could satisfy his soul. His quest had reached a point when life had become an unbearable burden. The Quran looks back on that time:

Have We not lifted and expanded your heart and relieved you of the burden which weighed down your back?<sup>14</sup>

God, indeed, relieved him of his burden. He turned in mercy to His Prophet, illuminating his path and guiding him on his journey. On February 12, A.D. 610, the Prophet sat alone in his cave. The angel of the Lord appeared before him in human form and taught him the words which appear at the beginning of the ninety-sixth chapter of the Quran. The Prophet's quest had finally been rewarded. His restless soul had joined in communion with the Lord. Not only did God grant him guidance, but He also chose Muhammad as His Prophet and special envoy to the world. The mission of the Prophet extended over the next twenty-three years. During this period, the entire content of the Quran—the final divine scripture—was revealed to him.

The Prophet of Islam discovered Truth in the fortieth year of his arduous life. It was an attainment that was not to usher in ease and comfort, for this Truth was that he stood face to face with an Almighty God. It was the discovery of his helplessness before the might of God, of his nothingness before the supernatural magnitude of the almighty. With this discovery, it became clear that God's faithful servant had nothing but responsibilities; he had no rights.

The meaning that life took on for the Prophet after the Truth came to him can be ascertained from these words:

Nine things the Lord has commanded me.
 Fear of God in private and in public;
 Justness, whether in anger or calmness;
 Moderation in both poverty and affluence;
 That I should join hands with those who break away from me;
 and give to those who deprive me;
 and forgive those who wrong me;
 and that my silence should be meditation;
 and my words remembrance of God;
 and my vision keen observation.<sup>15</sup>

These were not just glib words; they reflected the Prophet's very life. Poignant and wondrously compelling words of this nature could not emanate from an empty soul; they indicate the speaker's status; they are an outpouring of his inner being, an unquenchable spirit revealed in verbal form.

Even before the dawn of his prophethood, the Prophet's life had followed the same pattern. The motivation, however, had been subconscious; now, it came on to the level of consciousness. Actions previously based on instinctive impulses now became the well-conceived results of profound thinking. This is the state of one who reduces material needs to a minimum, whose life assumes a unique pattern, who in body lives in this world but in spirit dwells on another plane.

The Prophet once said,

A discerning person should have some special moments: a moment of communion with God;
a moment of self-examination;
a moment of reflection over the mysteries of creation; and a moment which he puts aside for eating and drinking.<sup>16</sup>

In other words, this is how God's faithful servant passes the day. Sometimes the yearning of his soul brings him so close to God that he finds something in communion with the Lord. Sometimes the fear of the day when he will be brought before the Lord for reckoning makes him reckon with himself. Sometimes he is so overawed by the marvels of God's creation that he starts seeing the splendours of the Creator reflected therein. Thus, he encounters the Lord, himself, and the world around him while finding time to cater to his physical needs.

These words are not a description of some remote being; they are a reflection of the Prophet's personality, a flash from the light of faith that illuminated his heart. These "moments" were an integral part of the Prophet's life. One who has not experienced these states can never describe them in such a lofty manner. The soul from which these words emanated was in the state they represent; through words, that state of spiritual perfection was communicated to others.

Before he received the word of God, this world—with all its shortcomings and limitations—appeared meaningless to the Prophet. But now that God had revealed to him that there was another perfect and eternal world besides this world, which was the actual abode of man, life and the universe took on new meaning. He now found a level on which his soul could subsist, a life in which he could involve himself, heart and soul. The Prophet now saw a real world into which he could put his heart and soul, a target for all his hopes and aspirations, a goal for all his life's endeavours.

This reality is discovered not merely on an intellectual level. When it takes root, it transforms one completely and raises one's level of existence. The Prophet of Islam gives us an excellent example of this way of life. The greatest lesson imparted by his life is that unless one changes one's plane of existence, one cannot change one's actions.

When the Prophet Muhammad discovered the reality of the world hereafter, it came to dominate his whole life. He became most desirous of the heaven of which he gave tidings to others, and he was most fearful of the hell of which he warned others. Deep concern for the life to come was always welling up inside him. Sometimes it would surge to his lips in supplication and sometimes in the form of heartfelt contrition. He lived on a completely different plane from that of ordinary human beings. Many incidents illustrate this, a few mentioned here.

Once, the Prophet was at home with Umm Salamah. He called the maid-servant, who took some time to come. Seeing signs of anger on the Prophet's face, Umm Salamah went to the window and saw that the maid was playing.

When she arrived, the Prophet had a miswak<sup>17</sup> in his hand. “If it wasn’t for fear of retribution on the Day of Judgement,” he told the maid, “I would have hit you with this miswak.” But, even this mildest of punishments was to be eschewed.

The men taken prisoner in the Battle of Badr were the Prophet’s bitterest enemies, but his treatment of them was still impeccable. One of these prisoners was a man named Suhayl ibn ‘Amr. A fiery speaker, he used to publicly denounce the Prophet to incite people against him and his mission. ‘Umar ibn al-Khattab suggested that two of his lower teeth be pulled out to dampen his oratorical zeal. The Prophet was shocked by ‘Umar’s suggestion. “God would disfigure me for this on the Day of Judgement, even though I am His messenger,” he said to ‘Umar.

This is meant by the world being a planting-ground for the hereafter. One who realizes this fact lives a life oriented towards the hereafter—a life in which all efforts are aimed at achieving success in the following, eternal world; a life in which real value is attached—not to this ephemeral world—but to the life beyond death. One becomes aware that this world is not the final destination; it is only a road towards the destination, a starting-point of preparation for future life. Just as every action of a worldly person is performed with worldly interests in mind, so every act of God’s faithful servant is focused on the hereafter. Their reactions to every situation in life reflect this attitude of looking at every matter from the perspective of life after death and of how it will affect their interests in the next world. Whether it be an occasion of happiness or sorrow, success or failure, domination or depression, praise or condemnation, love or anger—in every state, they are guided by thoughts of the hereafter until finally, these thoughts become a part of their unconscious minds. They do not cease to be mortal, but their minds come to function only on matters related to the world of immortality, making them almost forget their interest in worldly affairs.

Humility and Forbearance

The Prophet was a man like other men. Joyous things would please him, while sad things would sadden him. Realization of the fact that he was first and foremost God's servant, however, prevented him from placing more importance on his feelings than upon the will of God.

Towards the end of the Prophet's life, Mariah Qibtiyah bore him a beautiful and vivacious son. The Prophet named him Ibrahim, after his most illustrious ancestor. It was Abu Rafi' who broke the good news to the Prophet. He was so overjoyed that he presented Abu Rafi' with a servant. He used to take the child in his lap and play with him fondly. According to Arab custom, Ibrahim was given to a wet nurse, Umm Burdah bint al-Mundhir ibn Zayd Ansari, to be breast-fed. She was a blacksmith's wife, and her small house was usually full of smoke. Still, the Prophet used to go to the blacksmith's house to visit his son, putting up despite his delicate disposition—with the smoke that used to fill his eyes and nostrils. Ibrahim was just one and a half years old when he died in the tenth year of the Hijrah (January A.D. 632). The Prophet wept on the death of his only son, as any father would: in this respect, the Prophet appears like any other human being. His happiness and his grief were that of an ordinary father. But with all that, he fixed his heart firmly on the will of God. Even in his grief, these were the words he uttered:

God knows, Ibrahim, how we sorrow at your parting. The eye weeps, and the heart grieves, but we will say nothing that may displease the Lord.

It so happened that the death of Ibrahim coincided with a solar eclipse. From ancient times people believed that the death of some important person caused solar and lunar eclipses. So the people of Madinah began attributing the eclipse to the passing away of the Prophet's son. This caused the Prophet immense displeasure, for it suggested this predictable astronomical event was caused out of respect for his infant son. So he collected the people and addressed them as follows:

Eclipses of the sun and moon are not due to the death of any human being; they are just two of God's signs. Therefore, when you see an eclipse, you should pray to God.

On one of his journeys, the Prophet asked his companions to roast a goat. One volunteered to slaughter the animal, another to skin it, and another to cook it. The Prophet said that he would collect wood. "Messenger of God," his companions protested, "we will do all the work." "I know that you will do it,” the Prophet replied, “but that would amount to discrimination, which I disapprove of. God does not like His servants to assert any superiority over their companions.”

So humble was the Prophet himself that he once said:

By God, I do not know, even though I am God’s messenger, what will become of me and what will become of you.<sup>18</sup>

One day Abu Dharr al-Ghifari was sitting next to a black Muslim. Abu Dharr addressed him as a “black man.” Hearing this, the Prophet was very displeased and told Abu Dharr to make amends. “Whites are not superior to blacks,” he added. Abu Dharr became conscious of his error when the Prophet admonished him. He cast himself to the ground in remorse and said to the person he had offended: “Stand up and rub your feet on my face.”

The Prophet once saw a wealthy Muslim gathering his loose garment to maintain a distance from a poor Muslim sitting next to him. “Are you scared of his poverty clinging to you?” the Prophet remarked.

Once, the Prophet had to borrow some money from a Jew named Zayd ibn Sa’nah. A few days before the date fixed for the debt repayment, the Jew came to demand his money back. He went up to the Prophet, caught hold of his clothes, and said to him harshly: “Muhammad, why don’t you pay me my due? From what I know of the descendants of Muttalib, they all put off paying their debts.” ‘Umar ibn al-Khattab was with the Prophet at the time. He became angry, scolded the Jew and was on the point of beating him up. But the Prophet just kept smiling. All he said to the Jew was: "There are still three days left for me to fulfil my promise." Then he addressed 'Umar. "Zayd and I deserved better treatment from you," he said. "You should have told me to be better at paying my debts and him to be better at demanding them. So take him with you, 'Umar, and pay him his due; give him 20 sa'ahs (about forty kilos) of dates extra because you have alarmed him with your threats." The most remarkable thing about this episode is that the Prophet could still behave with such forbearance and humility even after being established as head of the Muslim state of Madinah.

So successful was the Prophet's life that, during his lifetime, he became the ruler of the whole of Arabia right up to Palestine. As God's messenger, whatever he said was accepted as law. His people revered him as no other man has ever been revered. When 'Urwah ibn Mas'ud was sent to him as an envoy of the Quraysh (A.H. 6), he was amazed to see that the Muslims would not let any water used by the Prophet for ablution fall on the ground but would catch it in their hands, and rub it on their bodies. Such was their veneration for him. Anas ibn Malik, the Prophet's close companion, says that despite their great love for the Prophet, out of respect, they could not look him full in the face. According to Mughirah, if any of the Prophet's companions had to call on him, they would first tap on the door with their fingernails. One night, when the moon was full, the Prophet lay asleep, covered in a red sheet. Jabir ibn Samrah says that sometimes he would look at the moon and sometimes at the Prophet. Eventually, he concluded that the Prophet was the more beautiful of the two.

Arrows rained down on the Prophet from the enemy ranks, but his followers formed a ring around him, letting the arrows strike their bodies. It was as though they were made of wood, not flesh and blood; indeed, the arrows hung from the bodies of some of them like the thorns of a cactus tree.

Devotion and veneration of this nature can produce vanity in a man and engender a feeling of superiority, but this was not the case with the Prophet. He lived among others as an equal. No bitter criticism or provocation would make him lose his composure. Once, a desert-dweller approached him and pulled so hard at the sheet he was wearing that it left a mark on his neck. "Muhammad!" he said. "Give me two camel-loads of goods, for the money in your possession is not yours, nor was it your father's." "Everything belongs to God," the Prophet said, "and I am His servant." He then asked the desert-dweller, "hasn't it made you afraid, the way you treated me?" He said not. The Prophet asked him why. "Because I know that you do not requite evil with evil," the man answered. The Prophet smiled on hearing this and had one camel-load of barley and another of dates given to him.

The Prophet lived in such awe of God that he was always a picture of humility and meekness. He spoke little, and even how he walked suggested reverence for God. Criticism never angered him. When he used to put on his clothes, he would say: "I am God's servant, and I dress as befits a servant of God." He would sit in a reverential posture to partake of food and say that this is how a servant of God should eat.

Once, a companion said, "If it is the will of God and the will of the Prophet ..." The Prophet's face changed colour in anger when he heard this. "Are you trying to equate me with God?" he asked the man severely. Rather say: "If God, alone, wills." On another occasion, a companion of the Prophet said: "He that obeys God and His Prophet is rightly guided, and he who disobeys them has gone astray." "You are the worst of speakers," the Prophet observed, disliking a reference which placed him in the same pronoun as the Almighty. He was very sensitive on such issues.

Three sons were born to the Prophet, all died in infancy. His four daughters, all by his first wife, Khadijah, grew to adulthood. Fatimah was the Prophet's youngest daughter, and he was extremely attached to her. When he returned from any journey, the first thing he would do, after praying two rak'at<sup>19</sup> in the mosque, was to visit Fatimah and kiss her hand and forehead. Jumai' ibn 'Umayr once asked 'Aisha whom the Prophet loved most. "Fatimah", she replied.

But the Prophet's whole life was moulded by thoughts of the hereafter. He loved his children, but not in any worldly way. 'Ali ibn Abi Talib, Fatimah's husband, once told Ibn 'Abdul Wahid a story about the Prophet's most beloved daughter. Fatimah's hands, he said, were blistered from constant grinding; her neck had become sore from carrying water; her clothes would become dirty from sweeping the floor. When the Prophet had received an influx of servants from some place, 'Ali suggested to his wife that she approach her father and ask for a servant. She went but could not speak to the Prophet because of the crowd. The next day, he came to their house and asked Fatimah what she had wanted to see him about. 'Ali told the Prophet the whole story and said he had sent her. "Fear God, Fatimah," the Prophet said, "Fulfill your obligations to the Lord and continue with your housework. And when you go to bed at night, praise God thirty-three times, and glorify Him the same number of times; exalt His name thirty-four times, and that will make a full hundred. This would be much better than having a servant." "If that is the will of God and His Prophet," Fatimah replied, "then so be it." This was the Prophet's only reply. He did not give her a servant.

The truth revealed to the Prophet was that this world did not spring up by itself but was created by one God, who continues to watch over it. All men are His servants and responsible to Him for their actions. Death is not the end of man's life; instead, it is the beginning of another permanent world, where the goodwill enjoys the bliss of paradise, and the wicked will be cast into a raging hell. The revelation of this truth also came with the commandment to propagate it far and near. Accordingly, ascending the height of the rock of Safa, the Prophet called the people together.

First, he made mention of the greatness of God. Then he went on to say:

By God, as you sleep, so will you die, and as you awaken, so will you be raised after death: you will be taken to account for your deeds. Good will be rewarded with good and evil with evil. And, for all eternity, the good will remain in heaven, and the evil will remain in hell.

One who goes against the times in his personal life faces difficulties at almost every step, but these difficulties are not injurious. They may wound one's feelings but not one's body. At the most, they are a test requiring quiet forbearance. But the position is quite different when one makes it one's mission to oppose convention publicly—when one starts telling people what they are required to do and what not to do. The Prophet was not just a believer; he was also entrusted with conveying the word of God to others. This latter role brought him into a headlong collision with his countrymen. All forms of adversity—from the pain of hunger to the trepidation of battle—were inflicted on him. Yet throughout the twenty-three years of his mission, he always remained just and circumspect in his actions. It was not that he had no human feelings in him and, therefore, incapable of bitterness; it was simply that the fear of God governed his conduct.

Three years after the Prophet's migration to Madinah, Makkan opponents mounted an assault on Madinah, and the Battle of Uhud occurred. In the beginning, the Muslims held sway; later on, a mistake made by some of the Prophet's companions gave the enemy a chance to attack from the rear and sway the tide of battle in their favour. It was a desperate situation, and many of the companions started fleeing from the field. The Prophet was left alone, encircled by the enemy's armed forces. Like hungry wolves, they advanced upon him. The Prophet started calling to his companions. "Come back to me, O servants of God," he cried. "Isn't anyone who will sacrifice his life for my sake, who will fend these oppressors off me and be my companion in paradise?"

Imagine how dreadful the situation must have been, with the Prophet crying for help in this manner. Some of his companions responded to his call, but such confusion reigned at the time that even these gallant soldiers could not protect him fully. First, 'Utbah ibn Abi Waqqas hurled a stone at the Prophet's face, knocking out some of his lower teeth. Next, a famed warrior of the Quraysh, 'Abdullah ibn Qumayyah, attacked him with a battle-axe, causing two links of his helmet to penetrate his face. They were so deeply embedded that Abu 'Ubaydah broke two teeth in his attempt to extract them. Then it was the turn of 'Abdullah ibn Shahab Zuhri, who threw a stone at the Prophet and injured his face. Bleeding profusely, he fell into a pit. When the Prophet was not seen on the field of battle for long, the word went around that he had been martyred. Then one of the Prophet's companions spotted him lying in the pit. Seeing him be alive, he cried jubilantly, "The Prophet is here!” The Prophet motioned to him to be silent so the enemy would not know where he was lying.

In this dire situation, the Prophet uttered a curse against certain leaders of the Quraysh, especially Safwan, Suhayl and Harith. How can a people who wound their prophet ever prosper!’ he exclaimed. Even this was not to God’s liking, and Gabriel came with this revelation:

It is no concern of yours whether He will forgive or punish them. They are wrongdoers.<sup>20</sup>

This admonition was enough for the Prophet, and his anger subsided. Crippled with wounds, he started praying for the people who had wounded him. Abdullah ibn Mas’ud later recalled how the Prophet was wiping the blood from his forehead, and at the same time, praying:

Lord, forgive my people, for they know not what they do.<sup>21</sup>

Biographies of the Prophet are full of incidents of this nature, which show his life to be a perfect model for humanity. They show that we are God’s servants, and servants we should remain in every condition. Being God’s humble servants, we should always remain in a state of trepidation before our Lord and the life hereafter. Everything in the universe should serve to remind us of God. In every event, we should see the hand of the Almighty; for us, every object should portray God’s signs. In all matters of a worldly nature, we should remember that everything will finally be referred to God. Fear of hell should make us live humbly among our fellows, and longing for paradise should impress on us the significance of this world. So conscious should we be of God's greatness that any idea of demonstrating our greatness should appear ridiculous. No criticism should provoke us, and no praise should make us vain. This is the ideal human character God displayed to us in the conduct of His Prophet.

SUBLIME CHARACTER

The Quran describes the Prophet Muhammad as a “sublime character.”<sup>22</sup> Here are two sayings of the Prophet which throw light on what this “sublime character” consists of:

Never debase your character by saying that if people treat you well, you will treat them well, and if they harm you, then you will do worse to them. Instead, become accustomed to being good to those who are good to you and not wronging those who harm you.<sup>23</sup>

Join hands with those who break away from you, forgive those who wrong you, and be good to those who harm you.<sup>24</sup>

The sublime character described here was displayed in its noblest form by the Prophet himself. Of course, ordinary Muslims require such character as an accessory, but with the Prophet, it was an essential requisite.

There are two levels of character, an ordinary and a superior level. A common character is based on the principle: do as you have been done by. Such a character might be termed a “knee-jerk character,” for those possessed of such a character offer only reflex responses to treatment by others, breaking with those who break with them, wronging those who wrong them, and harming those who harm them.

But the higher character level is based on the principle: do as you would be done. Those of such a character deal with friend and foe in the same principled manner, irrespective of how they have been treated. They are reconciliatory, even joining with those who break with them. They are compassionate, even to those who seek to harm them. They are forbearing, even towards those who wrong them.

According to the French philosopher Voltaire (1694–1778), “No one is a hero to his valet.” This is because a valet has access to a person’s private life; in private life, no one is perfect. Therefore, those close to a person usually do not hold him in such high esteem as those further off. That is why they cannot think of him as a hero. But this does not hold good for the Prophet Muhammad. On the contrary, history shows that the closer one came to him, the more one was impressed by his fine qualities.

Once, some members of the tribe of Banu Qayn ibn Jasn attacked the camp of the Banu Ma’an, a branch of the Tay tribe. While plundering, they captured an eight-year-old boy called Zayd, whom they sold as a slave at the fair of ‘Ukaz. It so happened that the latter came into the service of the Prophet, having been presented by his buyers to Khadijah shortly before her marriage to the Prophet. The boy’s father and uncle soon learnt of his whereabouts and came to Makkah to recover and take him home. They met the Prophet and said they would give any compensation he required if he returned the child to them. The Prophet said he did not want compensation; if Zayd wanted to go with them, they could take him. So Prophet called Zayd and asked him if he knew these people. Zayd said that he did: they were his father and uncle. "They want to take you with them." "I won't leave you to go anywhere: Zayd replied. His father and uncle were incensed on hearing this. "What, do you prefer slavery to freedom?" they asked. "Do you want to forsake your folk and live amongst others?" "I cannot prefer anyone to Muhammad." Zayd replied, "not after seeing the qualities that he has." They had no choice then but to go back home without him. Such was the charisma of the Prophet.

This incident, which occurred before the commencement of the Prophet's mission, reveals the tenderness that was inherent in his nature. The Quran has referred to this characteristic of his in the following words:

It was thanks to God's mercy that you were lenient with them. Had you been cruel and hard-hearted, they would indeed have deserted you.<sup>25</sup>

This magnanimity of the Prophet gave him the power to capture people's hearts: the closer one came to him, the more one would be won over by his noble character.

The Prophet once said: "Honouring ties of relationship does not mean honouring your ties with those who honour their ties with you; it means honouring your ties with those who sever their ties with you." The well-known case of ‘Aisha, wife of the Prophet and daughter of Abu Bakr, being accused of adultery is an apt illustration of this principle.

This slanderous accusation was brought against ‘Aisha when she was accidentally left behind while returning from the expedition to Banu al-Mustaliq (A.H. 6), then rescued by a young companion of the Prophet named Safwan ibn al-Mu’attal. Indeed, the episode has become famous in Islamic history as the “case of slander.” One of the persons responsible for fabricating it and spreading it far and wide was a relative of Abu Bakr named Mistah. When Abu Bakr learnt that Mistah was one of those who had defamed his innocent daughter, he cut off the allowance that he used to grant Mistah as a needy relative. When Abu Bakr took this step, God revealed this verse of the Quran to His Prophet:

Let not the honourable and wealthy among you swear not to give to their kindred, the poor, and those who have migrated for the cause of God. Instead, let them pardon and forgive. Do you not wish God to forgive you? He is Forgiving, Merciful.<sup>26</sup>

A person in need should not be denied financial assistance because of his misconduct. Instead, one should pardon him and continue to help him.

A man insulted Abu Bakr one day while he was sitting with the prophet. Abu Bakr listened but remained silent. The man continued to abuse him. Abu Bakr still held his peace. Finally, when the man kept repeating his foul tirade, Abu Bakr could no longer contain himself and answered.

On hearing this, the Prophet immediately got up and left. "Why have you left your place, Prophet of God?" Abu Bakr enquired. "As long as you remained silent, Abu Bakr," the Prophet replied, "God's angel was answering for you. But as soon as you burst out, the angel left." Thus the Prophet illustrated that God requites any wrong done to one, as long as one does not oneself retaliate. To one who seeks revenge, God turns a deaf ear. Therefore, retribution will be more complete if it is left to God.

The Prophet once borrowed some money from a Jewish scholar. After a few days, the Jew demanded payment of his debt. "At the moment, I have nothing to pay you with," the Prophet told him. "I won't let you go until you have paid me back," the Jew retorted. And so he stayed there, from morning until night, holding the Prophet captive. At this time, the Prophet was the established ruler of Madinah: he had the power to take measures against the Jew. His companions wanted to rebuke the man and chase him away. But the Prophet forbade them to take any action. "A Jew is holding you captive," protested one of them. "True," the Prophet replied, "but the Lord has forbidden us to wrong anyone." The night turned to morning. With the light of dawn, the Jew's eyes opened. He was profoundly moved on seeing the Prophet's tolerance, notwithstanding the latter's power to take action, and he thereupon embraced Islam. This Jew, a rich man, had detained the Prophet the day before on account of a few pence; but the Prophet's noble conduct had such an impact on him that now he was willing to give all his wealth to the Prophet, saying, "Spend it as you please."

'Abdullah ibn Abi al-Hasma' was once engaged in a transaction with the Prophet. It had not yet been completed when he had to go home on some urgent business. "Wait here," he said to the Prophet. "We'll settle this affair when I come back." When he reached home, he became so engrossed in certain tasks that he forgot his promise. He remembered it three days later and returned to where he found the Prophet still waiting. He said to 'Abdullah ibn Abi al-Hasma': "You have given me much trouble; I have been waiting here for three days." Such conduct has a powerful magnetism, which even the most obdurate person cannot resist.

Once, a group of Rabbis came to the Prophet. When they entered, instead of giving the normal 'Assalamu 'Alaykum' greeting, they said 'Assamu 'Alaykum', meaning "death to you." 'Aisha heard this and could not contain herself. "Death to you instead," she said. "May God damn you." The Prophet told 'Aisha not to answer back in this manner. "God is gentle," he said, "and He likes gentleness in every matter." In truth, there is no more effective method of winning a person's heart than by returning soft words for harsh ones. It is possible to withstand an armed onslaught, but noble conduct is a force that no one can resist. It is sure to prevail in all situations.

What a terrible thing it must have been for a man such as the Prophet when, as night was falling, he found the urchins of Ta'if chasing him out of town and pelting him with stones. Ta'if was where the Hijaz aristocracy used to while away their summer days, and the Prophet had made the fifty-mile trip from Makkah to call them to Islam. But the lords of Ta'if did not listen to his well-meaning words; instead, they set the street-urchins on him and kept chasing him until night had cast a veil between them and God's Prophet. His body was covered in wounds. Bleeding from head to foot and utterly exhausted, he took refuge in a vineyard. This, even for the most ordinary man, would have been a traumatic experience. The Prophet once told his wife, 'Aisha, that it had been the hardest night of his life. But even at this gravest of moments, the Prophet did not wish his enemies any harm.

On the contrary, he said, "Lord, guide them, for they know not what they do." Such was the noble character of the Prophet, and this nobility finally subdued his opponents and brought the whole of Arabia within the Islamic fold. The force of his sublime spirit was enough to conquer all in its path. No prejudice, antagonism or contumacy could withstand the magical power of good embodied in his person.

Absence of Acrimony

The Prophet had made peace with the Quraysh at Hudaibiyyah (A.H. 6) on three conditions: one was that if any Makkan accepted Islam and wanted to settle in Madinah, he must be surrendered to the Quraysh. But if any Madinan Muslims should go to Makkah, the Makkans would not send them back to Madinah. No sooner had this treaty been made than a Makkan youth named Abu Jandal escaped from Makkah and came to Hudaibiyyah, his body bearing weals and bruises where chains had abraded his skin. "Save me from the enemy!" he cried to the Muslims. This was an extremely sensitive moment. The companions of the Prophet drew their swords. The sight of Abu Jandal aroused their feelings to such a degree that most of them wanted to break the treaty and save his life. The Quraysh meanwhile reminded the Prophet that this was an occasion on which he would be obliged to abide by the pact that had been made between them. Finally, the Prophet decided that he could not go back on the terms that had been agreed upon. Painful as this decision was for the Muslims, Abu Jandal was returned to the Quraysh. Ostensibly the Prophet was putting an innocent victim of oppression back into the clutches of his oppressors. But, in effect, he acted on the highest moral principles. The oppressors, in turn, were confounded and awestruck by such uniquely ethical conduct, and then it became no ordinary matter for them to take Abu Jandal away and imprison him; instead, the event became symbolic of their degradation in contrast to the moral ascendancy of Islam. The result was that the people of Makkah were won over by the high ethical standards of Islam, which many of them started to embrace. Abu Jandal's presence in Makkah became a living testament to the truth of the prophet's faith. Even as a prisoner, Abu Jandal began to appear to his captives as a threat to their national security. Eventually, they deemed it prudent to free him and deport him from Makkah.

While the Prophet was living in Madinah, where he had attained religious and political leadership, he sent some riders to Najd, the inhabitants of which were his sworn enemies. On the way, they came across the ruler of the city of Yamamah, Thamamah ibn Uthal. They took him captive and brought him to Madinah, where they tied him against a mosque pillar. The Prophet came to enquire after him. "If you kill me," Thamamah said, "my people will avenge my blood, and if you release me, I will always be indebted to you. If it's money you want, then I am ready to give you as much as you desire."

The Prophet did not kill Thamamah physically but conquered the man's soul through humane treatment. After his release, Thamamah went to a nearby garden, bathed, and returned to the mosque. People wondered what he had come back for. But when he proclaimed his acceptance of Islam by pronouncing the testimony of faith in a loud voice, people realized that, by releasing Thamamah, the Prophet had, in effect, taken him captive for all time. Thamamah then went on a pilgrimage to Makkah. When the people of Makkah heard of his conversion, they told him that he had lost his faith. "I have not lost my faith," Thamamah answered. "Rather, I have adopted the faith of God and His Prophet." Thamamah, moreover, became a source of strength to Islam. Yamamah was one of the main places from which the people of Makkah used to collect grain. Thamamah told them that without the permission of the Prophet Muhammad, he would not provide them with a single grain. The case of Thamamah shows that noble conduct—though it may appear to have no practical value—can win the world.

Adopting a high code of ethics means practising what one preaches; treating the weak with the same courtesy and deference as one shows to the strong; setting the same standards for oneself as one sets for others; never budging from one's principles; maintaining a high moral bearing even when others stoop to the depths of degradation. From this point of view, the prophet of Islam stood at the highest pinnacle of human ethics, never abandoning the lofty standards that he preached. Expediency or dispute could not make him resort to unethical conduct. No evidence could be more substantial in this regard than that of his closest companions.

Sa'id ibn Hisham was the generation immediately following the Prophet Muhammad. He once asked 'Aisha, the Prophet's widow, about her late husband's character. "He was a personification of the Quran", 'Aisha replied. That is to say, the Prophet moulded his own life by the ideal pattern of life, which he presented to others in the form of the Quran. Anas ibn Malik served the Prophet for ten years. He says that the Prophet never even rebuked him. "When I did something, he never questioned my manner of doing it; and when I did not, he never questioned my failure to do it. He was the most good-natured of all men." According to 'Aisha, the Prophet never beat a servant, a woman or anyone else. To be sure, he fought for what was righteous. Yet, when he had to choose between two alternatives, he would take the easier course, provided it did not involve sin: no one was more careful to avoid sin than he. Moreover, he never sought revenge—on his behalf—for any wrong done to him personally. Only if divine commandments had been broken would he mete out retribution for the sake of God.

This conduct on the part of the Prophet made him respected even in the eyes of his enemies. His followers stood by him through all kinds of hardship and misfortune. He was as loved in times of oppression as in times of victory and supremacy. His immediate followers found him without blemish—just as he appeared from afar. He provided humanity with an inimitable model of exemplary conduct. The principles the Prophet based his life on were in the same mould as his sublime disposition. These principles never wavered. They formed a permanent part of his life. He applied them equally to those who followed his path and those who had harmed or aggrieved him.

Even in pre-Islamic times—known as the Age of Ignorance—the office of gatekeeper of the Kaabah had been held in high esteem. From ancient times the task had been allotted to one particular family. In the time of the Prophet Muhammad, a member of that family, ‘Uthman ibn Talhah retained it in his custody.

Al-Bukhari, the greatest compiler of traditions of the Prophet, had related how the Prophet, before he emigrated to Madinah, once desired to go inside the Ka'bah for worship. He asked 'Uthman for the keys to open the gate. 'Uthman refused and insulted the Prophet. 'Uthman,' the Prophet said, "perhaps you will see that I will have these keys in my hands one day. Then, I will have the power to dispose of them as I will." "It will be a day of disgrace and woe for the Quraysh when the keys of the Ka'bah are handed over to one like you," 'Uthman retorted.

Then the time came when the Prophet conquered Makkah and reigned supreme there. The first thing he did on entering the holy city was to go to the House of God. Seven times he circumambulated the Ka'bah. Then he summoned 'Uthman ibn Talhah. According to one account, 'Uthman had become a Muslim during the period in between the peace of Hudaibiyyah and the Conquest of Makkah. So the Prophet took the keys from him, opened the gate of the Ka'bah, and went inside. He remained there for a while, removing the idols within its walls.

Then he came outside, holding the keys in his hands. On his lips was this verse from the Quran:

God commands you to hand back your trust to their rightful owners.<sup>27</sup>

Then, 'Ali ibn Abi Talib, the Prophet's cousin and son-in-law, stood up: "God bless you," he said to the Prophet, "but we Banu Hashim have always been entrusted with the task of bearing water for pilgrims. Now is the time to take over the gatekeeper office as well." The Prophet did not reply to 'Ali and asked where 'Uthman ibn Talhah was. When he came forward, the Prophet handed the keys over to him. 'Uthman,' he said, "here are your keys. This is a day of righteousness and fulfilment of promises. They will remain in your family from generation to generation. It is only a wrongdoer who will take them away from you."

This action of the Prophet illustrates that Muslims should be meticulous in fulfilling obligations and returning trust. Even if they have been treated acrimoniously by those with whom they are dealing, they should still pay them their full due. However much it may hurt them, they should never deny people their rights.

When worldly people gain power, the first thing they do is punish their opponents, removing them from their posts and installing their supporters instead. All people who come to power think in terms of supporters or opponents. Promoting supporters and demoting opponents is an essential part of their policy. But when the Prophet of Islam gained control in Arabia, he did quite the opposite. He did not look at matters in terms of supporters and opponents; he considered only what was right and fair. He buried all grudges and dealt with everyone as justice and compassion would demand.

LESSONS OF THE PROPHET'S LIFE

The Rewards of Restraint

In the Quran, these words have been addressed to the faithful:

You have an excellent example in God's Apostle for anyone who always looks to God and the Last Day and remembers God.<sup>28</sup>

It is clear from this verse that, in the life of the Prophet Muhammad, there is a perfect example for every human being. But the only actual beneficiaries will be those whose apprehension of God is already profound, whose hopes and aspirations centre on God, and whose lives are lived in fear of the punishment of the Lord. Those who cherish the thought of eternal bliss and indeed yearn for it with every fibre of their beings will be the ones to learn from the Prophet's example.

Why should this be so? The reason is that one has to be sincere in one's search for truth if one is going to find it. If one "looks to God and the Last Day," one will be sincere concerning them. Sincerity will enable one to see the life of the Prophet in proper perspective and draw the right lessons from it.

This point can be understood from one example. The following saying of the Prophet is related to the Hadith:

One killed in defence of his property is a martyr.

One killed in defence of his life is a martyr. One killed in defence of his religion is a martyr. One killed in defence of his family is a martyr.<sup>29</sup>

As the text shows, this hadith is about being “killed,” not about fighting. The Prophet did not mean that whenever there is a threat to one’s property, life, religion or family, one should immediately resort to arms, even if one is slain. Instead, he meant that if a believer is killed on any of these grounds, their death is martyrdom. The hadith is not an incitement to fight; it is a promise of martyrdom to those who are slain.

Those who are not sincere in their attitude to religion, however, who are more concerned with giving their whims the stamp of prophetic sanction, will take the words of the hadith and use them to justify their selfish quarrels and nationalistic conflicts. They will say Islam teaches you to stand up for your rights like a man; it urges you to fight in defence of your faith, your life and property, your family and your relatives. If you are victorious, then you have achieved your ends; and if you are defeated, then you are a martyr, and it is only a fortunate minority who attain the heights of martyrdom.

But those who fear God will look at the matter soberly. Then, after intense mind-searching, they will ask themselves: if you are required to fight in defence of your property, life, religion and family, why are there cases in the Prophet's life of his not doing so? In the face of manifest oppression, why did the Prophet often adopt a passive attitude and exhort others to do the same?

The following incident, for instance, has been recorded by Ibn Hisham on the authority of Abu 'Uthman al-Nahdi. When Suhayb decided to emigrate to Madinah, the Quraysh said, "You came to us in an abject and destitute state. You became rich while with us. Eventually, you reach your present state of wealth. Do you think we will let you run away and take everything with you? If so, you are mistaken!" Suhayb enquired, "If I hand over all of my wealth to you will you let me go then?" They said they would, so Suhayb gave them everything he had. When the Prophet heard this, he said: "Good for Suhayb! He has made a good profit."

If the previously mentioned hadith means—in an absolute sense—that one should fight and give one's life in defence of one's property under any conditions whatsoever, the Prophet should have condemned Suhayb's failure rather than felicitated him on his success.

The case of Abu Jandal (see Part I, Chapter IV) also illustrates this point. When, at Hudaibiyyah, in the year of A.H. 6, during peace negotiations with the Quraysh, young Abu Jandal, bloodstained and in chains, pleaded with the Muslims not to send him back to the polytheists now that he had accepted Islam, the Prophet ordered that, according to the terms of the treaty which had been agreed upon, he be sent back to Makkah. "Abu Jandal," he said, "be patient. God will grant you, and those persecuted along with you, release from your suffering."

If the previously mentioned hadith enjoined one to fight and be martyred irrespective of the conditions, the Prophet would not have urged patient resignation on Abu Jandal; instead, he would have told him to seek martyrdom; he and his companions would have fought with great zeal at Abu Jandal's side.

During the same Hdaybiyyah encounter, the Quraysh told the Prophet they would not let him enter Makkah that year. Accepting this, the Prophet returned to Madinah without insisting on visiting the House of God. This was an entirely religious affair; indeed, the Prophet had acted on divine inspiration in setting out for Makkah with his companions. Even so, he withdrew. If the previously mentioned hadith had referred to fighting and being martyred in an absolute sense, the Prophet would have insisted on visiting the House of God that year, whether he had succeeded in his purpose or been martyred in the process.

'Ammar ibn Yasir and his parents were servants of the Banu Makhzum tribe in Makkah when they accepted Islam.

Their conversion was utterly anathema to the Banu Makhzum. They would take the family out to the desert in the heat of noon and lay them down on the burning sand, where they would savagely torture them. They even went so far as to murder 'Ammar's mother. Relating this incident, this is what the Prophet's biographer, Ibn Hisham, writes:

When the Prophet passed them by, from what I have heard, he would say to them: "Be patient, the family of Yasir. Heaven is your promised land."<sup>30</sup>

If the hadith mentioned above were meant in an absolute sense, then the Prophet's advice to Yasir would have been tantamount to encouraging cowardice. The Prophet would then have never given such advice. Instead, he would have urged Yasir to fight and be martyred. Then, he would have taken up this holy cause, whether the result had been Yasir's release or his martyrdom.

The truth is that the example of the Prophet is open to more than one interpretation, and it may happen that the wrong—or right—interpretation is made. Only if one is sincere will one interpret the situation correctly, and this can only be achieved through the realism that comes from the fear of God.

When sincere people consider these incidents in the Prophet's life, questions such as those posed here are bound to crop up in their minds. They are not just seeking a meaning which will serve their ends; instead, they are seeking to ascertain the exact nature of the example imparted by the Prophet. This approach keeps them from misinterpretation. They will look at the matter objectively, and God's grace will enable them to arrive at the heart of the matter. They will see that the secret lies in realizing one thing: that minor losses must be endured for the sake of significant gain.

The consideration that should be uppermost in a believer's mind is what serves the interests of Islam, not their interests. Their preoccupation must be with preaching the message of Islam. If there is a clash between personal and preaching interests, preaching of the faith must come first. In the interest of his preaching mission, the Prophet advised patience in the situations mentioned above. The Prophet endured all kinds of personal, financial and domestic losses to ensure the continuation of his efforts to spread the faith. He knew that the Muslims' success in this life and the next lay in their pressing on with missionary work.

When one has a purpose in life, that purpose assumes overriding importance. One will bear losses in life to achieve it. In the absence of such a purpose, one becomes preoccupied with every trivial matter. To avoid small losses, one must put up with even greater ones. The preachers of God's word are the most purposeful people in the world: they endure small losses in pursuit of their greater aim. They avoid clashing with others on any issue which would harm their missionary work. They only act in self-defence when forced to do so, for this does not interfere with their greater goal.

Considering this, let us look at incidents of great moral significance during the Prophet Muhammad's life.

Never Yielding To Despair

The tribal system prevalent in the time of the Prophet protected individuals. It was seldom that anyone could survive without it. At the beginning of the period he spent in Makkah, the Prophet Muhammad enjoyed the protection of his uncle, Abu Talib, chieftain of the Banu Hashim. However, Abu Talib died in the tenth year of his mission, and his mantle descended upon Abu Lahab. Since Abu Lahab refused to extend any protection to him, the Prophet began seeking the protection of some other tribe to continue his preaching work. It was for this purpose that he went to Ta'if.

Along with Zayd ibn Harithah, the Prophet made the 65-mile journey to Ta'if, a fertile oasis southeast of Makkah. He had some relatives in the town, but power rested with three individuals at that time: 'Abd Yalayl, Mas'ud and Habib. The Prophet met all three of them, and all three refused to join him or even extend their protection. "I will tear the curtain of the holy Ka'bah if God has made you His Prophet," one of them said. "Couldn't God find anyone else to send as His Prophet," added another sneeringly. "I swear I won't speak to you!" said the third. "It would be an insult to you for me to do so if you are a true prophet and an insult to myself if you are false in your claims."<sup>31</sup>

Dispirited, the Prophet set out on the return journey. But still, the people of Ta'if did not leave him alone. Instead, they set the urchins upon him, and a volley of stone-throwing and abuse drove him out of town. Zayd tried to shield the Prophet with his blanket, but with no success: he was wounded from head to foot.

Some way out of town, there was a vineyard belonging to two brothers, Utbah and Shaybah. It was dusk when the Prophet reached there, and he took refuge in it. His body was covered in wounds, but on his lips were prayers. "Lord," he cried, "help me; do not leave me to fend for myself."

'Utbah and Shaybah were both polytheists, but when they saw the Prophet's condition, they took pity on him. They had a Christian servant by the name of 'Addas. They told him to fetch a few grapes bunches and take them in a bowl before their guest. 'Addas did as he was told: he brought some grapes to the Prophet and requested him to partake of them. The Prophet recited the name of God as he took them in his hand to eat. 'Addas looked at the Prophet's face. "By God," he said, "it is not usual for people in this land to utter these words." The Prophet asked 'Addas where he came from and his religion. 'Addas replied that he was a Christian and hailed from Nineveh in Iraq. "So you are from the town of the good Jonah, son of Matthew," the Prophet observed. "How do you know Jonah, son of Matthew?" 'Addas retorted. "He was a prophet, and so am

I,” the Prophet said. On hearing this, ‘Adidas bowed before the Prophet, kissing his head, hands and feet.

‘Utbah and Shaybah were looking on. “Look,” they said to one another. “This fellow has corrupted our servant.” “Shame on you.” they said to ‘Addas when he returned. “What were you kissing the fellow’s head, hands and feet for?” “Master,” ‘Addas replied. “There is nothing greater than him on the face of the earth. He told me something that no one but a Prophet can reveal.” “Shame on you!” they repeated. “Be careful that he does not turn you away from your religion; for your religion is better than his.”

In a single journey, God’s Prophet was treated in three different ways by three different groups of people: one pelted him with stones, a second extended hospitality to him, and a third acknowledged his prophethood.

A great lesson from this event is that there is no end to possibilities in this world. If you stand in an open plain, there will surely be a tree shade where you can rest. If some oppress you, do not despair, for if you adhere to the path of truth and do not respond negatively to such treatment by others, God will surely come to your assistance. Some may not rally to your cause, but you are sure to find a place in the hearts of others.

The Prophet Forced Into Exile

The Prophet Muhammad met dire opposition when he started his preaching mission in Makkah in A.D. 609. When he presented the message of Islam before the disbelievers of Makkah, they proudly pointed out that they were already involved in great religious work. "Why should we become Muslims," they protested, "when we already look after the Sacred Mosque and give water to the pilgrims?" This verse of the Quran was revealed in condemnation of their argument:

Do you pretend that He who gives a drink to the pilgrims and pays a visit to the Sacred Mosque is as worthy as a man who believes in God and the Last Day and strives for God's cause? These are not held equal by God. He does not guide the wrongdoers. Those who have embraced the faith migrated from their homes, striven for God's cause with their wealth and persons are held in higher regard by God. It is they who shall triumph.<sup>32</sup>

Initially, the message of the Prophet of Islam had nothing but conceptual truth behind it. It was an abstract message with no material grandeur attached. On the other hand, the Kaaba in Makkah had assumed the status of an institution backed up by grand architecture and glorious historical traditions. Consequently, associating oneself with the Ka'bah was socially acceptable; it even became a symbol of pride. To associate oneself with the message of the Prophet of Islam, meanwhile, amounted to belief in a religion which had not yet come into its own and had no material benefits to offer.

The people of Makkah, therefore, did whatever they could to thwart him, and he was subjected to torment upon torment. But his mission continued to gain ground, and finally, the message of Islam reached the people of Madinah, most of whom accepted Islam. Together with the Prophet, other Muslims were also persecuted in Makkah. The Prophet told them to go to Madinah, where they would be received by their Muslim brethren, who were ready to give them succour. So, one by one, the Muslims started emigrating to Madinah. When the Quraysh heard about this scheme, they tried to prevent the Muslims from leaving Makkah: some they beat up, some they took captive; but somehow, most of the Muslims managed to reach their refuge in Madinah.

Finally (A.D. 622) came the Prophet's turn. The Quraysh realized that, with the rest of the Muslims safely installed in Madinah, it would not be long before the Prophet joined them. So leaders of all the tribes of the Quraysh, except the Banu Hashim, met in the great hall of Qusayy ibn Kilab's house, where all such meetings were held. Various proposals were put forward, but finally, all agreed that a person from every tribe should attack and kill Muhammad: his blood would thus be divided over all eleven tribes, the Banu Hashim, the tribe to which the Prophet belonged, being unable to fight with all of them, would accept compensation instead. The next night, they surrounded the Prophet's house, waiting for the Prophet to emerge so they could pounce on and kill him.

The Prophet knew precisely what was going on. Quietly, he continued his preparations. Then, according to plan, he left Makkah with Abu Bakr that night. The Prophet realized they would send search parties pursuing him when news of his departure reached the Quraysh. So he and Abu Bakr hid in a cave of Mount Thawr, four miles out of Makkah. They planned to stay there a few days until the Quraysh called off their search, and the two could continue their journey to Madinah.

The Quraysh horsemen started looking everywhere for the Prophet. It was not long before one brigade reached his hideout in Mount Thawr. There they were, armed and standing at the mouth of the cave: the Prophet and Abu Bakr could even see their feet. Abu Bakr, sensing the critical danger they were in, said to the Prophet: "The enemy is upon us." "Don't worry," the Prophet reassured him: "God is with us. We are only two," he continued calmly, "but how do you rate two men who have God as a third companion?"

Absolute Trust in God

Another such incident occurred during an expedition made by the Prophet known as Dhat al-Riqā' (A.H. 4). Recorded in al-Bukhari, as well as in biographies of the Prophet, it is related by Jabir.

“Would you like me to kill Muhammad?” This terrible question was put by a member of the Banu Ghatfan tribe, Ghaurath ibn al-Harith, to his tribe’s people. The answer was overwhelmingly affirmative, but they wanted to know how it would be possible. Ghaurath replied with confidence, “I shall catch him unawares and kill him!” And this is precisely what he set out to do. When he reached the camp of Muhammad and his companions, he chose his moment well. He waited until the Prophet, and his companions had settled down to rest, unarmed, in the shade of the trees. The Prophet lay alone, and his sword dangled from the branches above him. Ghaurath darted forward, snatched the weapon, and bore down on the Prophet. “Who will save you from me?” he challenged, savouring this moment. “God,” the Prophet replied quite simply. Daunted, Ghaurath said, “Take a look at the sword I am holding! Don’t you fear it?” “Of course not,” the Prophet said. “Why should I fear it when I know God will save me?” The supreme confidence of the Prophet’s reply proved too much for Ghaurath, and his courage left him. Instead of attacking the Prophet, he put the sword back in its sheath and returned it to him. The Prophet then made him sit down and called his companions. When they arrived, he told them the whole story. Ghaurath was petrified, expecting to be killed at any moment. But the Prophet let him go without inflicting any punishment on him.<sup>33</sup>

Those who put absolute trust in God do not fear anything or anyone. The faith that God, a Live and All- Powerful Being, is always there to help you makes you bold in the face of every other power. Fearlessness is a person's greatest strength when faced with an enemy. Don't fear any foe, and the foe will start fearing you.

Reaching A Consensus

Shortly before the Battle of Badr (A.H. 2), the Quraysh sent a vast caravan of merchandise and sixty men to Syria. Although the Muslims subsequently defeated the Quraysh at Badr, their commander, Abu Sufyan, successfully managed to steer this caravan, where the people of Makkah had placed all their capital, home to Makkah, by a coastal route. However, defeat at Badr had left the Quraysh thirsty for revenge on Muhammad and his followers. Their leaders, therefore, met in Dar al-Nadwah (The Hall of Convention), where it was unanimously decided that the partners in the caravan should take their capital only, leaving the profits to be devoted to preparations for war. The profits amounted to 50,000 dinars, a considerable sum in those days.

The Quraysh made elaborate preparations and, in A.H. 3, advanced on Madinah.

It was then that the Battle of Uhud took place, just three years after the Prophet's migration to Madinah. He called his companions when news of the Quraysh's advance reached the Prophet. Most of them were inclined to meet the attack from within the city. The youthful element among them, however, was vehemently opposed to this. They contended that if we remained in the town, the enemy would interpret it as a sign of cowardice and weakness: they should take the fight outside the city. ‘Abdullah ibn Ubayy, however, concurred with the opinion of the leading companions.<sup>34</sup>

There were reasonable grounds for the view that the attack should be met from within the city. The geography of Madinah had all the makings of a natural defence system. To the south were orchards of date-palms, so thickly clustered as to make an attack impossible from that side. To the east and west, high mountains provided a natural barrier to any invader. There was only one front from which Madinah could be attacked. The city itself was a natural fortress. To leave it amounted to exposing oneself to an enemy attack on all four sides, whereas from within the town, only one front would have to be defended. And indeed, Madinah's favourable location was subsequently taken advantage of in the battle, later known as the Battle of the Trench, in which the entire city was protected by the simple expedient of digging a trench on the open front to the northwest of the town.

Although most of the leading companions, as well as ‘Abdullah ibn Ubayy, were in favour of meeting the attack from within the city, the Prophet decided to accede to the wishes of the younger Muslims: along with an army of one thousand, he left the city and set off for Uhud. ‘Abdullah ibn Ubayy was deeply offended to find that his wise and proper advice had been over-ruled. He followed the army with a heavy heart, but before the Muslims reached Uhud, he and 300 followers turned back. "He agreed with them and not with me." 'Abdullah ibn Ubayy lamented, "so I fail to see why we should destroy ourselves on this field of battle."<sup>35</sup>

The Muslims' defeat at Uhud vindicated the opinion of those in favour of meeting the attack from within the city. Accordingly, this strategy was duly adopted at the Battle of the Trench (A.H. 5). All the leading companions of the Prophet, however, forgot their disagreement and remained in the Muslim army. Despite heavy losses from bearing the brunt of the battle, they fought valiantly alongside the Prophet. Only 'Abdullah ibn Ubayy separated himself from the Muslim force, so he became known as the "Leader of the Hypocrites." In principle, 'Abdullah ibn Ubayy's opinion had been correct; it was also borne out by the experience on the field of battle, but although he was right, his disobedience incurred God's displeasure and was considered a form of transgression.

Islam attaches great importance to consultation. Everyone has a right to put forward their point of view. But no policy can be effectively pursued if everyone expects their view to prevail, no matter the circumstances. Only one course has to be followed, so when there is disagreement over what that course should be, not everybody's view can be accommodated. True Muslims, then, should, after offering their opinion, forget what they think and follow the directives of decision-makers as if their decisions were their own.

There is no greater sacrifice than that of one's own opinion. Like a building, which can only be constructed if many bricks are buried in the ground, a strong society can only come into being if individuals are ready to bury their personal opinions—to act in unity with others despite their disagreements. This is the only foundation on which a community of individuals can be formed; it is as necessary to the foundation of human society as bricks are to the foundation of a building.

During the year A.H. 8, an expedition was made to Muta. Part of Muhammad ibn Jarir al-Tabari's description of the expedition runs like this:

Abu Qatadah tells us that the Prophet sent an army to Muta. He appointed Zayd ibn Harithah as commander; if he was martyred, then Ja'far ibn Abu Talib was to take over; and if he was killed in action, the choice should fall on 'Abdullah ibn Rawahah. Ja'far jumped when he heard the Prophet's decision and said he would not serve under Zayd. The Prophet told him to go along, "for you do not know what is best for you." Then the army set off.<sup>36</sup>

A believer is no angel; he is a mortal human being like any other. Still, there is an enormous difference between a believer and any other human being. Others do not know how to go back on mistaken and perverse notions once they have them fixed in their minds. So, right or wrong, they stick to their opinions. They follow their desires rather than sound reason.

On the other hand, a believer's attitude should be quite different. True believers set themselves straight when shown to be on a wrong course and correct themselves when their mistakes are pointed out. Rather than being set in their opinions, they should always be open to criticism and ready to rectify themselves, even when this means doing something they do not want to do.

A believer submits to truth, while others submit to nothing but their own selves.

Avoiding Confrontation

The year after the Battle of the Trench, in A.H. 6, the Prophet Muhammad had a dream in Madinah. In it, he saw himself and his companions visiting the House of God in Makkah. His companions were delighted to hear this, for it meant that, after a lapse of six years, they would soon be going to Makkah and visiting the Holy Ka'bah. In accordance with this dream, the Prophet set out for the holy city with 1400 of his companions. When they reached Ghadir Ashtat, they heard that the news of their journey had reached the Quraysh. Indignant at the idea of the Muslims visiting the House of God, they had amassed an army and vowed to prevent Muhammad and his companions from entering Makkah, although it was contrary to Arab tradition to prevent anyone from visiting the Ka'bah. The Prophet was acting under divine inspiration: perhaps that is why he remained calm when he heard of the Quraysh's reaction. However, he was informed by his spies that Khalid ibn al-Walid, intent on blocking the Muslims' path, had advanced with two hundred cavalymen to Ghamim. On hearing this, the Prophet changed route, deviating from a well-frequented path to a little-known and arduous route, which led him to Hdaybiyyah. In this way he avoided clashing with Khalid's army. This is how the historian Ibn Hisham describes the events:

“Who can show us a path not occupied by the Quraysh?” the Prophet asked. Someone volunteered to do so. He then guided the Muslims by a route which led through arduous, rocky and mountainous passes. The Muslims had great difficulty in crossing these passes, but when they had done so and emerged upon an open plain, the Prophet called on them to seek the forgiveness of God and turn to Him. This they did, and the Prophet said that this was the word of forgiveness, which the Israelites had been called upon to utter, but they had failed to do so.<sup>37</sup>

This was a trying time for the Muslims, but they faced their trial with patience and forbearance. This was the path laid down for them by God. Even the slightest hesitation to follow that path was considered a transgression, for which forgiveness had to be sought. Therefore, the Prophet urged his followers to repent and seek forgiveness for any weakness or irritability they may have shown at that taxing time. Difficulties were to be faced with fortitude. No impulse was to cause one to deviate from the path of God.

To survey the situation, the Prophet halted at Hudaybiyyah, nine miles from Makkah. From Hudaybiyyah, he sent one Kharash ibn Umayyah on camelback to inform the Makkans that the Muslims had come to visit the House of God, not to do battle. On reaching Makkah, Kharash's camel was slaughtered, and attempts were made to murder him, but somehow he managed to escape and return to Hudaybiyyah. The Prophet then sent 'Uthman to appeal to the Makkans to refrain from hostilities and tell them that the Muslims would return quietly to Madinah after performing the rites of 'Umrah.<sup>38</sup> The Makkans paid no heed and took him, prisoner. Later Mikraz ibn Hafs and fifty men attacked the Muslim camp at night, raining stones and arrows down on the pilgrims. Mikraz was captured, but no action was taken against him: he was released unconditionally. Then, as the Muslims were praying in the early morning, eighty men attacked them from Tan'im. They were also taken captive and then allowed to go free unconditionally.

Lengthy negotiations with the Quraysh ensued. Finally, a truce was made between the two sides. At first sight, this truce amounted to an outright victory for the Quraysh and a defeat for the Muslims. The Prophet's followers could not understand how, when God had given them tidings of a visit to the House of God, the Prophet could have agreed to return to Madinah without performing the visit. They would be allowed to come the following year but would have to leave the city after a stay of only three days. Humiliating clauses such as this, exacerbating as they were for the Muslims, were all accepted unquestioningly by the Prophet. It seemed to be an acceptance of defeat.

The Quraysh deliberately acted aggressively to offend the Prophet. They wanted to provoke him into initiating hostilities so that they could find an excuse for fighting him. To prevent a visit to the Ka'bah was quite contrary to Arab tradition. Moreover, it was the month of Dhu'l-Qa'dah, one of four months considered sacred in Arab lore, in which fighting was prohibited. The Quraysh wanted to fight the Muslims, but they did not want to be accused of having desecrated the holy month; they wanted to be able to lay the blame at the door of the Muslims, who were few in number at that time, and not even equipped for battle. Yet, there they were, stranded 250 miles from home, right on the border of enemy territory. It was a perfect opportunity for the Quraysh to unleash a savage onslaught on the Muslims and give full vent to their antagonism. They did everything they could to provoke the Muslims into starting a fight, but the Prophet ignored every provocation; he scrupulously avoided falling into their trap.

The situation was so grave that Abu Bakr was the only one of the companions not to feel that, in accepting humiliating peace terms, they had bowed before the aggressor. They were even more astonished when a verse of the Quran was revealed, which referred to the agreement as an “obvious victory.” “What kind of victory is this?” one of them protested. “We have been prevented from visiting the House of God. Our camels for sacrifice have not been allowed to proceed. God’s Prophet has been forced to turn back from Hudaibiyyah. Two of our persecuted brethren, Abu Jandal and Abu Basir, have been handed over to their persecutors ...” Yet this humiliating treaty paved the way for a great Muslim victory.

The Treaty of Hudaibiyyah appeared to be a capitulation before the enemy; however, it allowed the Muslims to strengthen themselves and consolidate their position. The Prophet accepted all the Quraysh’s demands in return for their assurance that they would cease all hostilities against the Muslims for ten years. However, continual raids and warfare threats prevented the Muslims from pursuing constructive missionary work. As soon as the Prophet returned from Hudaibiyyah, he intensified missionary work in and around Arabia, the groundwork having been done beforehand. Now that peace prevailed, the message of Islam started spreading like wildfire.

People in their thousands, tribe after tribe, thronged to join the fold of Islam. Islam began spreading beyond the borders of Arabia too. Safe from the polytheists of Makkah, the Prophet was able to take action against, and drive out, the Jews of Khaybar, who had missed no opportunity of helping the enemies of Islam. He also turned his attention to building up the strength of Islam in Madinah. The culmination came within only two years of the Treaty of Hdaybiyyah: the Quraysh surrendered without even putting up a fight. There was no further barrier to the Prophet's triumphant entry into Makkah. The deliberate imposition of a humiliating retreat from Makkah paved the way for victory.

People nowadays tend to resort to arms at the slightest provocation from their enemies. When the losses of meaningless war are pointed out to them, they justify themselves by saying they were not the aggressors; the enemy had wickedly involved them in warfare. They do not realise that non-violence does not mean remaining peaceful so long as no one is acting violently towards you; it is to refrain from violence even in the face of violence—to refuse to be provoked even in the face of provocation. Insidious plots should be met and defeated by quiet deliberations. Deeply rooted though the antagonism of one's foes may be, one should not let their resistance become either a stimulus or a vindication of one's actions.

Fighting one's enemies is no way to succeed in life. Only by avoiding conflict can one consolidate one's strength. Then by awe alone, will one be able to overpower one's foes?

To fight at the slightest provocation and ignore the need to build up one's strength quietly is to condemn oneself to destruction. Such conduct can never lead to success in this world of God. The Prophet achieved success by pursuing a policy of non-confrontation; how, then, can his followers succeed by following a policy of confrontation? How can they be called his followers when blind to his example? How can they expect him to intercede for them on the Day of Judgement?

THE PATH OF THE PROPHET

Evolution not Revolution

The word “sunnah” in Arabic means a path. In the religious context, it refers to the manner of life pleasing to God, which has been revealed to man through His Prophets. The word is used in the Quran for all the forms divine law has taken throughout the ages.

When God created the world, He also ordained a path to follow. Moreover, he enforced this divine course so strictly on the world of nature that there cannot be the slightest deviation from it. But God did not impose His will on humanity. Instead, he gave us freedom of thought and action: those who followed His path of their own free will would be rewarded with paradise, while those who deviated from it would be punished in hellfire.

God wishes to make this known, guide you along the path of those who have gone before you, and turn to you in mercy. He is Wise, Knowing.<sup>39</sup>

God’s prophets came to the world to make this chosen path plain to us. In their words and deeds, they showed us how to live by the will of God. This way of life is known in Islam as the sunnah, or path, of the prophets. It covers every aspect of life, from personal matters to social reform and nation-building. Those who earnestly seek to be included amongst God's chosen servants must follow the path of the Prophet in all respects. In no walk of life should they consider themselves free to tread another course.

The most important practice of the Prophet's personal life was preaching the word of God. A study of his life shows that his most significant concern was to bring people to the path of the Lord. That his concern had turned to anguish is clear from this verse of the Quran:

You will perhaps fret yourself to death on account of their unbelief.<sup>40</sup>

The Prophet said that one who disregarded his sunnah was not one of his community. Just as this remark applies to the marriage contract and other social obligations, so does it equally apply to calling people to the path of God. Therefore, only those have the right to be called faithful followers of the Prophet, who, along with other obligations enjoined by him, adopt this all-important practice of the Prophet.

One aspect of the Prophet's public mission was a realistic, step-by-step approach to everything he did. In applying theoretical standards, he always made allowances for practical realities. He was always careful to introduce social reforms gradually. In modern jargon, his approach can be called evolutionary rather than revolutionary. 'Aisha, the Prophet's wife, has explained this principle very clearly:

The first chapters of the Quran to be revealed were short ones making mention of heaven and hell. Then, when people became conditioned to accept Islamic teachings, verses dealing with what is lawful and unlawful were revealed. And if injunctions like: “Do not drink wine” and “Do not commit adultery” had been revealed first, people would have refused to abandon these practices.<sup>41</sup>

With the conquest of Makkah in A.H. 8, the Prophet assumed complete control over the Arabian capital. Yet he did not seek immediate implementation of Islamic laws in the House of God in Makkah; whatever was to be done, he did gradually. Islamic rule had been established in the holy city when the pilgrimage of A.H. 8 took place, but it was performed according to ancient, pre-Islamic custom. Next year, the second pilgrimage of the Islamic era was performed with the polytheists following their traditions and the Muslims theirs. Only in the third year the Prophet announced that the pilgrimage would be performed entirely according to Islamic tenets. This pilgrimage is known as Hajjat al-Wida’ in Islamic history—the farewell pilgrimage of the Prophet.

It was instinctively abhorrent to the Prophet that the polytheists should come to the Sacred Mosque and perform the rites of pilgrimage according to their customs. Yet, despite the power he wielded, he did not hurry to implement the Islamic system. Rather, he refrained from going to Makkah on a pilgrimage for two years after the conquest. “I would not like to go on a pilgrimage while the polytheists are coming there and performing the rites of pilgrimage naked," he would say when the Hajj season arrived.

Some Muslims went on Hajj the year after the conquest of Makkah (A.H. 8), but the Prophet was not among them. The following year in A.H. 9, the Muslim party of pilgrims was led by Abu Bakr. It was after this that the polytheists were banned from making the pilgrimage. The prohibition came in this verse of the Quran:

Believers know that idolaters are unclean. Let them not approach the Sacred Mosque after this year is ended.<sup>42</sup>

The Prophet then sent his cousin 'Ali to Makkah with orders that he should mingle amongst the gathering of pilgrims and proclaim that after this year, no polytheist would be allowed to come on Hajj and tawaf (circumambulation of the House of God) in a naked state would not be permitted. Then, in the third year, following the gradual elimination of polytheism, the Prophet undertook what was to be his final pilgrimage to the Sacred Mosque.

This shows how the Prophet was careful to introduce reforms gradually. Even when he wielded power, he did not attempt to hurry Islamic legislation; he allowed matters to take their natural course, proceeding stage by stage until the desired conclusion was reached; he would hold himself back from introducing the desired measures, but he would not seek to hold the polytheists back from their activities until the time came when they were ready to refrain from them.

Many sides of the Prophet have not generally been acknowledged as necessary: for one thing, his realistic and gradual approach to everything he did has never been hailed as being of particular significance. For instance, the Prophet lived in Makkah for thirteen years after the commencement of his prophetic mission, but not once did he remonstrate against the continual desecration of the Kab'ah. Even after conquering the city, he was in no hurry to abolish vain and frivolous customs. He waited for two years, even though he had the power to take immediate action. Only in the third year did he introduce the reforms he had in mind.

A gradual approach reaps several advantages, which cannot be accrued from any other method. First, it guarantees success in attaining one's objectives. One who adopts this approach does not advance further until he has consolidated his previous position. He does not let himself be carried away by his zeal; instead, taking external factors into account, he proceeds with the times. There can be no doubt that one, who is so cautious in his progress, will ultimately reach his goal.

Moreover, there is less risk of incurring unnecessary losses or liabilities. Those who seek to achieve too much too soon find, inevitably, that they have to surmount enormous obstacles before they are really in a position to do so. Such attempts can result in incalculable loss of life and widespread property damage. Making amends for such imprudence could take centuries.

Unswerving Obedience

Towards the end of the Prophet's life, the fertile regions bordering pre-Islamic Arabia were controlled by the two great imperial powers of the day—the Sassanians and the Byzantines. To the north lay the emirates of Basra and Ghasasina and the Roman province of Petraea, ruled by Arab chieftains. Roman influence there had led most of the inhabitants to embrace Christianity. To the south and northeast were the emirates of Bahrayn, Yamamah, Yemen and Oman, the last known as the Mazun province. These states were under the Persian (Sassanian) Empire, and the religion of their Persian masters—Zoroastrianism—had spread among their peoples.

In A.H. 6 (A.D. 628), the Prophet made a ten-year truce with the Quraysh at Hudaibiyyah. Then, with peace on the home front, he sent letters to the rulers of the territories surrounding Arabia, inviting them to accept Islam. The Prophet's envoy took one such letter, Shuja' ibn Wahb al-Asadi, to al-Harith ibn Abu Shimr of Ghasasina. The words in the letter, "have faith in God; you will retain your sovereignty", incensed the Arab chieftain. He threw the letter aside, saying: "Who can take away my kingdom?"

The ruler of Basra, Shurahbil ibn 'Amr Ghassani, proved even more contemptuous. The Prophet sent Harith ibn 'Umayr with a letter to this Roman governor. On the Syrian border, he entered the town of Mu'tah and was killed there by an Arab, acting at the governor's behest.

According to international conventions, this act amounted to aggression by one state against another. There were also signs that the Roman army based in Syria was planning to advance on Madinah: Byzantium could not tolerate the emergence and development of an independent power on Arab soil.

When news of Harith ibn ‘Umayr’s murder reached Madinah, the Prophet decided that military action would have to be taken against the perpetrators of such cold-blooded aggression. He gave orders that the Muslims should gather—with their weapons—at a place called Harq. A force of three thousand, under Zayd ibn Harithah, was assembled. After delivering some parting advice, the Prophet sent them to Syria.

When the Muslim army arrived at Ma’an in Syria, they pitched camp. The governor of Basra had already prepared for battle, and he was further encouraged by the news that the Roman emperor, Heraclius, had arrived in nearby Ma’ab with a force of 1,00,000. The local Christian tribes, Lakhm, Juzam, Qayn, Bahra and Balli, supported their Byzantine co-religionists and agreed to fight under the leadership of the Banu Balli chieftain, Malik ibn Zafilah. Then, this Roman force of over 100,000 was amassed on the Syrian front to meet a Muslim army of only 3,000 men.

Zayd ibn Harithah was slain in battle, and two subsequent leaders—Ja’far ibn Abi Talib and ‘Abdullah ibn Rawahah, were also martyred after him. The collapse of the standard led to disarray in the Muslim ranks. Then a soldier named Thabit ibn Aqram came forward, lifted the standard, and cried out to his fellow Muslims: "Agree on one leader!" "We have agreed on you," they shouted back. Thabit, however, declined to accept the command and asked for it to be conferred instead on Khalid ibn al-Walid. The Muslims shouted their agreement. Hearing this, Khalid ibn al-Walid came forward, held the standard aloft, and advanced on the Roman lines. The Byzantine forces were then forced to retreat.

The outcome of this battle was indecisive, however, and there always remained the possibility that the Arabs of Petraea, with Roman help, would advance on Madinah and seek to stamp out the nascent power of Islam. That threat had been felt as early as A.H. 5, when 'Umar ibn al-Khattab, on being asked by another companion if he had heard any news, replied: "What? Have the Ghasasina arrived?"

The Prophet was fully aware of this threat and made sure in his last days that full preparation had been made for a force to combat the Petraean wing of the Roman army. The recruited force included leading companions such as Abu Bakr and 'Umar, but the Prophet did not put them in command. Instead, he wisely appointed Usamah ibn Zayd, who, besides being a courageous young warrior, was also spurred on by the fact that his father, Zayd ibn Harithah, had been killed by the Romans in the Battle of Muta. This army, however, was unable to advance during the lifetime of the Prophet. With his death in A.H. 10, Abu Bakr was appointed as the first Caliph, and he finally gave the order to march on Syria.

After the death of the Prophet, news started pouring into Madinah of mass apostasy among Arab tribes. Most Arab tribes that embraced Islam after the conquest of Makkah in A.H. 8 had converted impressed by the political dominance of Islam rather than from having undergone any profound intellectual transformation or from having attained any such conviction as had the earlier followers of the Prophet. They had been accustomed to a free and easy life, and some of the Islamic injunctions—especially zakat<sup>43</sup> were more than they could tolerate. Some months before the death of the Prophet, demagogues had arisen in Yemen and Najd that exploited this situation putting forward a new brand of Islam, according to which there was no need to pay zakat. To give their words more weight, these demagogues—notably Aswad and Musaylamah—laid claim to prophethood, for only then could they challenge the zakat system.

Zakat was part of the religion revealed to the Prophet Muhammad; they would have to pretend to prophethood to speak with the same authority. Their “prophethood” became very popular among the tribes who regarded zakat as a burden and flocked to these false prophets’ support. Their morale was boosted with the death of the Prophet in A.H. 10, and apostasy started spreading like wildfire, the only places remaining immune being Makkah, Madinah and Ta’if. There were reports, too, that these rebels were preparing to attack Madinah.

Much as the first Caliph, Abu Bakr, wanted the army to advance, most of the companions were against this. "These Arab tribes are in the throes of revolt," they said. "Madinah is liable to be attacked at any time. The army should stay to defend Madinah rather than be sent to a distant land."

The other reservation they had was about Usamah's leadership, for he was only seventeen years of age and, worse, was the son of a servant. How, they thought, could great companions of the Prophet serve under him, a mere stripling? Moreover, an older and more experienced war general than Usamah was appointed to lead that army.

'Umar, who had been with Usamah's army, returned to Madinah to convey their message to Abu Bakr. The Caliph listened to what he had to say about the first matter and replied: "Even if I am the only one remaining in Madinah after the army's departure, and I am left to be devoured by wild beasts. Still, I cannot recall an army the Prophet himself despatched." He dismissed the matter of Usamah's youth and rank with these words: "What, are the Muslims still proud and arrogant, as in the time of ignorance?" Saying this, he went on foot to send the army on its way under Usamah's command. With Usamah aloft on his mount, the Caliph of the Muslims walked alongside, speaking with him on matters concerning the military campaign. He wanted to end the Muslims' misgivings about Usamah's leadership, and this was the most practical and effective way of doing it. Their reservations vanished on seeing the Caliph walking alongside Usamah's mount.

As news of the advance of Usamah's army spread around Arabia, opponents saw it as a sign of the Muslims' confidence. They presumed that the Prophet's followers must have considerable reserves of strength to send an army so far from Madinah at such a critical time. Accordingly, they decided to await the outcome of the Syrian campaign before attacking the city: if the Muslims met defeat, they would be sufficiently weakened for an offensive against their capital to be feasible.

Usamah ibn Zayd's army was eminently successful against the Romans. The campaign, which lasted forty days, also proved that Usamah was the most suitable person for this expedition for his father, who had been martyred fighting the Roman army at Muta and was keen for revenge. Consequently, many captives and significant booty returned with the Muslims to Madinah. The rebels lost heart on seeing this, and their revolt was quelled with comparative ease. So the Muslims achieved success on both fronts, simply by having done as the Prophet said.

They thus provided an excellent lesson for subsequent generations of Muslims: that the place for Muslims to test their strength was the outside world, not among themselves. But successive generations of Muslims have failed to learn this lesson, and in the present age, the situation has deteriorated to the point where the Muslim world is locked in battle with itself on every front.

No one is ready to face any challenge outside the Muslim world, but all are willing to fight against their Muslim brethren. Undoubtedly the most significant challenge facing Muslims today is the dissemination of Islam in the outside world, but since they are so busy fighting among themselves, it is not surprising that they have no time or energy for this all-important task.

There was another important reason for the Prophet's insistence on the despatch of the army. The Arab tribes had been fighting among themselves from time immemorial and would start fighting again if not confronted with some external foe on whom to test their strength. Towards the end of his life, the Prophet averted this danger by pitting them against the might of the Roman army. The Arabs now had an eminently suitable arena to display their valour. They no longer had time for the fratricide and plundering which had hitherto been their way; instead, they turned their attention to distant horizons, blazing their way—within just one hundred years—to conquests that spanned three continents.

PART TWO

THE REVOLUTION OF THE PROPHET

It is the will of God that His religion should reign supreme on earth. He wishes it to enjoy intellectual dominance over other systems of thought. But for this to happen, certain conditions must prevail. The coming of the Prophet Muhammad was the culmination of a lengthy process, extending over thousands of years, during which time the ground was fully prepared for his work. Conditions were created which would facilitate the accomplishment of his mission. What the Prophet had to do was understand these conditions and make wise use of them. This he did, giving Islam a position of intellectual ascendancy in the world.

Now, once again, a process has continued over the last one thousand years, in which God has created conditions conducive to Islamic revival. If they are fully exploited, Islam can once again dominate world thought, just as it did in the past.

But if these opportunities are to yield the maximum benefit, it will require an intense struggle, which only those with profound knowledge of contemporary conditions can undertake. It will be those who rise above reactionary psychology and concentrate on positive action who will be fit for this task; people who can sacrifice every other consideration and devote themselves wholeheartedly to one overriding goal—the ascendancy of Islam; those who steer clear of the confusions of human thought, and are guided by divine wisdom in their course of action. Such noble spirits will not be inspired by thoughts of national glory or material grandeur; it will be the greatest of God alone that they seek to establish. It was people such as these who made Islam great in the past—who gave Islam its position of intellectual dominance—and it is people such as these who can do so once again. If, on the other hand, we are lured by superficial slogans and distracted by every petty issue that arises, all we shall accomplish is the destruction of the opportunities God has created for us. We shall never then be able to convert possibilities into realities.

A Comparison

The Islamic revolution that occurred in the time of the Prophet was achieved at the cost of only 1018 lives. During the 23 years this revolution was completed, 80 military expeditions took place. However, the Prophet only participated in some 27 of them, and an even smaller number of expeditions involved any fighting. As a result, 259 Muslims and 759 non-Muslims died in these battles—1018 dead. This is a minimal number of casualties inflicted during such a great revolution that changed human history. Therefore, the Islamic revolution of the Prophet can be called a bloodless revolution.

Contemporary Muslim writers and speakers are wrongly eulogistic in comparing the Prophet's revolution with modern non-Islamic revolutions. They point with pride to the fact that only a thousand people died in the Islamic revolution, while in the Russian revolution of 1917 alone; thirteen million people lost their lives. The democratic revolution in France also took a heavy toll, which ran into thousands.

The Muslims like this comparison because it gratifies their pride. But there is another comparison to be made here, which they have never considered. Perhaps their failure to give thought to this second comparison is simply a way of avoiding admonishment, for no one ever likes being admonished.

It would mean taking the number of dead in the initial Islamic missionary drive and comparing it with the toll that modern-day Islamic movements have exacted; in other words, seeing how many people died in the original Islamic revolution and how many have died in Muslim revolutionary attempts of modern times. The 20th century has seen grand Islamic revolutionary movements and great "holy crusades" in the Muslim world. Just as Muslims compare the Prophet's Islamic revolution with modern, non-Islamic, secular revolutions, should they look at their movements in the light of the revolution of the Prophet and see how they stand up to the comparison?

Were the Muslims to take this comparison, they would be startled to find that their movements are, in relation to that of the Prophet, no better than revolutionary movements in the non-Muslim world. Just as non-Muslim revolutions have been highly expensive in human terms, so the death toll in Muslims' revolutionary struggles has been incredibly high: two and half million dead in the Algerian war of independence, 500,000 Muslim martyrs in the Indian freedom struggle; 10 million lives lost in the formation of the Muslim state of Pakistan. The number of people who have given their lives for Islam in Syria, Iraq, Iran, Egypt, Palestine and various other countries runs into millions. And for all that, these sacrifices have amounted to nothing. The effects of the Prophet's revolution were felt the world over, yet it was accomplished at the cost of only 1000 lives. On the other hand, Islamic movements of modern times have involved millions of human lives, yet, despite this, one cannot point to even a small area in which the Islamic revolution has been truly successful and effective.

The matter does not end there. Far from being successful, our recent struggle has produced an adverse effect. These words of the Bible ring precisely accurate concerning our efforts of modern times:

Ye shall sow your seed in vain, for your enemies shall eat it. They that hate you shall reign over you. And your strength shall be spent in vain: for your land shall not yield her increase, neither shall the trees of the land produce their fruits.<sup>44</sup>

Such has been the story of modern Muslim history. We conducted the Caliphate and pan-Islamic movements with great gusto, and made untold sacrifices for these causes, only to see the Muslim world split up under numerous national governments. We struggled for our country's independence, but when it came, other parties took hold of the reins of government. We suffered significant losses in forming the Islamic state of Pakistan, but secular leaders took control when it came into existence. We gave our utmost to establish Islamic rule in Egypt, but finally, power fell into the hands—not of religious groups—but of military dictators. For nearly forty years, we have been crusading for the end of the state of Israel, making enormous human and monetary sacrifices in the process, but all that has happened has been the expansion and consolidation of the Jewish state. And now, after the indescribable tribulations of the people of Iran, it will not be long before we hear that the Islamic republic was only a stepping-stone for rule by unIslamic forces.

These are the hard realities of our times. We can pull the wool over our eyes, but we cannot expect future historians to do likewise. True, they will be forced to say that the Russian revolution took a vast toll on human lives, but it also brought about significant changes in the world thought. It caused the collapse of Tsarist, or monarchical rule, and replaced it with a republican form of government; it established the ascendancy of the socialist economic system over capitalism. As for Islamic revolutionary efforts have been even more costly in human terms, but they have left no stamp on the pattern of the world thought.

The revolution of the Prophet's time shows us that if just a thousand people are ready to give everything they have for the Islamic cause, then God does not let their sacrifices go unrewarded; He establishes the supremacy of Islam on earth. In modern times millions of Muslims have shown themselves willing to make sacrifices, but God has not taken up our cause. Despite all our sacrifices, our efforts have been frustrating. This indicates that our efforts have been misdirected. If we had been following the straight path that God laid down for us, He would indeed have made us successful, as promised in this verse of the Quran:

We have given you a glorious victory so that God may forgive your past and future sins, perfect His favour, guide you to the right path, and bestow on you His mighty help.<sup>45</sup>

A farmer who sows wheat will reap wheat. He is not telling the truth if he claims to have sown wheat, only for brambles to spring up in its place. It just does not happen that a wheat seed should yield a crop of brambles. Things do not work that way in this world of God. So it is with our efforts in modern times. If we had indeed been following the path of the Prophet and his companions and had made sacrifices in the same spirit, our mammoth efforts would have yielded positive results. It is no use deluding oneself into thinking that one is struggling in the path of Islam when one's efforts are not producing the results which true Islamic struggle ought to ensure. One may live in a fool's paradise in this world; a true paradise in the next world is for those who base their lives not on illusion and fantasy but on reality.

Divine Succour

Addressing the faithful, God says in the Quran, “Believers, if you help God, He will help you and make you strong.”<sup>46</sup> Here, “helping God” means fitting in with His scheme. God has set a specific pattern for making things happen in this world; He has created favourable circumstances, which, if properly exploited, will yield good results. We can fit in with His scheme by coordinating our efforts with this pattern. God strengthens those who help Him in this way.

Here is an example of what happens when one fails to do so. A priest wanted to see a lush tree standing before his house. “If I plant a seed,” he thought, “it will take at least ten years to grow into a full tree.”

So what he did was to uproot a large tree and, hiring several labourers to transport it from where it had stood, he installed it in front of his house. “Good,” he thought, “I have achieved ten years of work in a single day.” How shocked he was, then, when the next day, he woke up to see the leaves of the tree withering away. By evening its branches were hanging limp, and within a few days, the leaves had died and fallen to the ground; all that remained in front of his house was a stump of dry wood. A few days later, a friend visited the priest, who found him walking restlessly in his garden. “What’s wrong?” he inquired. “Why are you so upset today?” “I am in a hurry, but God isn’t,” the priest answered, telling the whole story of the tree. In whatever happens in the world, there is a part played by

God and a part played by man. It's like a machine, which functions when two cog wheels revolve in unison: one is that of God, and the other is of man. Man's success can only come from his keeping to God's pace. If he tries to proceed independently, he will break because God's wheel is stronger than his.

Over the millennia, God has made certain provisions for the growth of trees and plants: He has laid a layer of fertile soil on the surface of the earth; He has given them the heat that they need from the sun; He has provided them with water, and assisted their growth with alternation of the seasons; then He has created billions of bacteria which provide the roots with nitrogen. These arrangements are God's cog-wheel. Next, we must attach our wheel to God's, for only then will we be able to use these opportunities to form a tree. Once our wheel is connected to God's, we have only to take a seed and plant it in the ground. Nature's machine will then set to work, and production will ensue. If, on the other hand, we plant our tree on a rock, sow a plastic imitation seed in the ground, or do as the priest did and transplant a full-grown tree, then we have not set our wheel at work with God's; we have not fitted in with God's scheme. As a result, we cannot expect to see a lush tree growing in our garden.

So it is with the Islamic revolution. It likewise comes from recognizing the opportunities God has created and using them well. True Islamic revolution does not emerge from haphazard action. The initial Islamic revolution was achieved by a few of God's servants fitting their wheel in with God's. But, on the other hand, our sacrifices of modern times have all gone amiss because we have not followed God's scheme. Instead, we have trodden the path of our desires, seeking to achieve by futile and irrelevant protests, which can only come from the wise use of the opportunities that God has afforded us.

The generations following Adam, the first man on earth, all worshipped one God. Humanity, as the Quran says, "was one community."<sup>47</sup> The situation continued for a few centuries, but worship of worldly phenomena, or polytheism, became prevalent. People found it difficult to focus on an invisible God, so they focused it elsewhere, on visible objects, reducing belief in God to the lowly and unimportant status of an abstract creed. At this time, the sun, moon and stars became objects of worship, and the mountains and oceans became considered gods. Divinity was even ascribed to those mortals who stood out among their fellows. So it was that, after about 1000 years on earth, people saw the end of the conceptual dominance of monotheism, and their intellect became clouded with polytheistic thought.<sup>48</sup>

After other initial monotheistic religions declined, God started sending prophets to the world. These prophets, however, never achieved enough popularity to eradicate polytheism and reassert the dominance of monotheism. At that time, prophets came to every part of the inhabited world—according to one hadith, there were 124,000 of them—but each was scorned and laughed at.

When an individual rejects the truth, they do so for a reason; they do so because something occupies such an important place in their lives that they cannot forsake it, even for the truth. The Quran tells us the nature of the attachment that alienates individuals from the true message of the prophets:

When their apostles brought them clear signs, they exulted in such knowledge as they had;
but (soon) the scourge at which they scoffed encompassed them.<sup>49</sup>

Knowledge means the corrupted form of religion, which people have been adhering to for so long that they have come to think of it as sacred. The faith passed on from one generation to the next in this manner becomes lodged in people's minds. When they think of it, they think of the saints whose names are associated with it. It becomes a part of the establishment, the foundation of a people's national infrastructure. Enshrined in elaborate tradition, it assumes a position of dominance in society.

When prophets visit such people as adhere to established polytheistic religions, their teaching of monotheism is a lone voice in that environment. They assert the truth of their teachings, but their claim has yet to receive the ratification of history. They can only reason with their people, trying to persuade them to see the light. With the clamour of established religion on all sides, such quiet reasoning falls on deaf ears; the prophets appear insignificant compared to the grandeur surrounding the faith of their people's ancestors. Take the case of Jesus Christ, homeless and sleeping under a tree, while the chief priest of the Jews resided in the lavish splendour of the palace of Haykal.<sup>50</sup> How could people accept someone who slept under a tree as the bearer of truth rather than the occupant of the grand palace of Haykal? That is why people poured scorn on their prophets. They held established figures in reverence: why should they forsake them for an insignificant creature without status? True, prophets of the past were also objects of their esteem, but these prophets had become more national heroes than preachers of truth in the eyes of their admirers.

Attaching oneself to a message and quite another to an institution is one thing. Nothing is more difficult than service carried out following a message, and nothing is easier than service in an institution's name. All a message has in support of it is its conceptual truth, while all sorts of material grandeur back up institutions. Those who extend their support to a message when backed up by nothing but simple truth will find honour and rank in the sight of God. When it gains the status of an institution, then its support of it will earn one no credit with God. Commitment to Islam as a message is an act carried out for God. However, commitment to Islam as an institution is all too often entered into for the material benefits that accrue from it.

Exaltation of the Word of God

Just as traffic lights are erected at crossroads to guide and control traffic, prophets have been sent by God to stand on the roads of life, show travellers the road leading to heaven, and warn them to steer clear of what leads to hell. The Quran has put this in the following words:

Thus We have made of you a people justly balanced, that you may be witnesses over the nations, and the Prophet a witness over yourselves.<sup>51</sup>

For this purpose, when polytheism first displaced monotheism as the predominant religion of humanity, prophets came to the world. Bestowing on the knowledge of the truth, God sent them to guide people along the right path and warn them to steer clear of evil. All of the prophets fully discharged this responsibility. Their teaching of truth was both understandable and reasonable. Moreover, they left no stone unturned in their communication of truth: those who believed in them became worthy of paradise, while those who rejected them made themselves fit only for hell.

Yet God wanted more than a mere proclamation of truth on earth; He wanted it to be exalted once again. Proclamation of truth necessitates its complete exposition before us. It is to make the truth clear to all listeners, to enlighten them, using the “wise and mild exhortation” that the Quran prescribes for preachers of truth.<sup>52</sup> People are left with no excuse for not accepting the truth when this is done. They can no longer say that they were left in ignorance. The only defence people who fail to follow the truth can offer a lack of awareness; where they have been shown every proof, there remains no pretext for denial.

Exaltation of the word of God is something more than this. It means religious thought assumes ascendancy over all other systems of thought. The word of God does not become exalted on earth by any legislative or political programme; it can only come from a struggle on an intellectual level. When the truth is engraved in people's minds, the word of God becomes genuinely exalted, not when it is written in statute books. In this day and age, modern knowledge has stolen the limelight from ancient forms of knowledge: empirical science has taken over from analogical philosophy as the dominant mode of thought; socialism is a more prominent intellectual force than capitalism; democracy is a more forceful political theory than monarchy. These are all examples of conceptual ascendancy, the dominance of one system of thought over another. This nature of conceptual ascendancy of truth over falsehood must be achieved for the word of God to become exalted.

God can do all things. Therefore, it would have been easy for Him to make truth lord over all else, just as He has made the sun supreme over all other forms of light. But, since we are being tested in this world, God causes things to happen within the bounds of cause and effect. If events were to occur miraculously, we would have no choice but to see the hand of God in them: there would be no test involved. It was within the bounds of cause and effect that God established the dominance of His word on earth. He created all the necessary circumstances to achieve this end and then sent a prophet charged with bringing it to fruition. The Prophet's task, therefore, was not only to proclaim the truth but also to make the truth a predominant force on earth, thus completing God's favour to humanity and allowing us to avail of the divine succour of which their waywardness had deprived us:

They seek to extinguish the light of God with their mouths, but God will perfect His light, much as the unbelievers may dislike it. He has sent His apostle guidance and the Faith of Truth, so He may exalt it above all religions, much as the pagans may dislike it.<sup>53</sup>

A New Nation Is Born

The Prophet Muhammad once said: "I am the prayer of Abraham." The prayer he was referring to was that offered by Abraham when he was building the Holy Kaaba in Makkah:

Lord, send them an apostle of their own people (the Children of Ishmael) who shall declare your revelations, instruct them in the Book and in wisdom, and purify them from sin. You are the Mighty, the Wise One.<sup>54</sup>

Yet, approximately two and a half thousand years elapsed between Abraham's prayer and the birth of the Prophet Muhammad. The Prophet Zakariyya (Zachariah) prayed for a prophet-son,<sup>55</sup> and within a single year, his wife bore him Yahya (John the Baptist). Why did Abraham's similar prayer take so long to be answered?

This was because John the Baptist had a primary mission to carry out. He was to expose the religious pretence of the Jews by being martyred at their hands so that they would no longer be fit to be bearers of the divine scriptures; another nation would have to come to replace them. The Prophet Muhammad, on the other hand, had to reestablish the dominance of monotheism over polytheism. But, naturally, this could not be effected without the necessary antecedents: conditions conducive to this had to be created in the world; a nation upright enough to aid the Prophet in accomplishing this task had to come into existence. All this took two and a half thousand years to come about so that the event could take place within the bounds of cause and effect, as is the way of God.

In accordance with this scheme, Abraham was commanded to leave the civilized territory of Iraq for the dry, barren reaches of Arabia, where he was to settle along with his wife Hagar and son Ishmael.<sup>56</sup> This was an uncultivable area, cut off from the rest of the world. Far from the trappings of civilization, in the lap of nature, a community could be raised where all the natural abilities were fully preserved. Abraham had prayed for the emergence of a people submissive to God, and this was a land ideally suited for the development of such a people:

Lord, make us submissive to You; make of our descendants a nation that will submit to You.<sup>57</sup>

A nation of unprecedented dynamism would be required to establish the dominance of true religion on earth. Earlier generations, which had grown up in the artificial environment of human civilization, had lacked the dynamism and vitality needed to perform this task. This was the reason the previous prophets failed to elicit a positive response. Therefore, a new nation would have to grow up, nurtured under conditions especially suited to cultivating these qualities. This would involve a long process of human reproduction, extending over several generations. This accounts for the 2500-year gap between Abraham's prayer and its fulfilment: when the stage was fully set, the prophet he had prayed for was born to Aminah, the daughter of Wahab ibn 'Abd Manaf of the Banu Hashim in Makkah.

Nothing but dry land and inhospitable rubble awaited Abraham when he arrived in Makkah with his wife and infant son. Soon the water in their flask finished, and Ishmael started thrashing with his hands and feet because of his great thirst. It was then that the spring of Zamzam gushed forth, a sign that although God had indeed made them face a stiff test, He would not leave them to face it alone: they were engaged in God's work, and He would always be there at crucial moments to grant them succour. When Ishmael was in adolescence, Abraham dreamt he was slaughtering his child. He interpreted it as God's commandment and readied himself to carry it out. Then, as he held the knife poised over Ishmael's throat, a voice came from heaven telling him to stop and sacrifice a lamb instead. This was a sign from God that Abraham would have to prepare himself for enormous sacrifices: but he was not required to make them; it was the will to sacrifice that was desired. Once he had shown that he could pass this test, he would be spared the actual deed. After all, God intended to use Abraham and his family to enact a great scheme; far from letting them pointlessly lay down their lives, He would protect them.

Ishmael grew up and married a girl of the Jurham tribe, which had settled in Makkah after the water of Zamzam had sprung up. Abraham was in Syria at the time. One day he came on horseback when Ishmael was not at home; only his wife was there, and she did not recognize her father-in-law. "Where has Ishmael gone?" Abraham asked. "Hunting," she replied. "How is life treating you?" Abraham went on, and Ishmael's wife complained to him about the poverty and hardship they had to endure. Then, as he was leaving, Abraham told her to convey his greetings to Ishmael and ask him to "alter his threshold." When Ishmael returned, she told him the whole story.

Ishmael realized that the visitor had been his father, who had come to see how things were going. By "altering his threshold," Ishmael knew what his father had meant: he was to marry a new wife, for this one was unsuitable for the creation of the progeny God had in mind. So he divorced that wife and married someone else. After some time, Abraham made another appearance on horseback. Again Ishmael was not at home. Abraham asked his new daughter-in-law the same questions as he had put to the previous one. This time, however, Ishmael's wife was all praise for her husband and said that everything was fine with them; they had much to be thankful for. Abraham set off and told her to convey his greetings to Ishmael and to ask him to "keep his threshold." This wife was ideally suited to the task at hand; Ishmael should keep her in wedlock.<sup>58</sup>

So it was that, in the solitude of the Arabian Desert, the seeds of the progeny that was to be known as the Children of Ishmael were sown. These were the initial stages of preparation of a people who, 2500 years later, were to provide the Final Prophet with the support he needed in performing history's most mammoth task.

The qualities of the nation that grew up in the barren expanses of the desert around Makkah can be summed up in one word—al-muru'ah (manliness). This was the word of the highest esteem that Arabs used to describe essential human qualities in a person. As an ancient Arab poet has written:

If a person fails to achieve manliness when young, he will find it hard to do so when he grows old.

This is how the eminent Arab historian, Professor Philip K. Hitti, sums up the qualities of the people that developed over hundreds of years in the Arabian Desert:

Courage, endurance in times of trouble (sabr), observance of the rights and obligations of neighbourliness (jiwar), manliness (murū'ah), generosity and hospitality, regard for women and fulfilment of solemn promises.<sup>59</sup>

The Best Nation

The nation that emerged from this 2500-year development process was the nation most richly endowed in human qualities that humanity had seen:

You are the best nation that has ever been raised for humanity.<sup>60</sup>

Commenting on this verse, ‘Abdullah ibn al-’Abbas refers to those who emigrated from Makkah to Madinah along with the Prophet. That small group of Muhajirs represented all those Arabians who made up the group known as the Companions of the Prophet.

Prophets of every age have confronted one major obstacle: the adherence of their people to an ancestral religion, which enjoyed unrivalled material grandeur. But, on the other hand, they were standing on the abstract ground of truth and reason. This nation that had grown up in the Arabian Desert had the unique ability to recognize truth abstractly—before it had gained any external lustre. They had been reared under open skies in the wilderness of the vast desert and had developed an extraordinary capacity for recognizing plain, unvarnished truth. Moreover, they were prepared to give up everything for the sake of truth when it was a solitary force and one that appeared to have nothing to offer them in return. ‘Abdullah ibn Mas’ud summed up these qualities of the Companions in the following words:

They were the cream of the Muslim community, the most warm-hearted, the most knowledgeable, and the least formal. They were the ones that God chose to accompany His prophet and establish his religion.

What polytheism had deprived man of more than anything was the ability to see the truth on an abstract level. It had made him want to see and feel something before he would believe it. The prophets who came to the world spoke of a truth, which was an abstract force. Their peoples could not appreciate this, hence the scorn and ridicule to which prophets have been subjected in every age.

The polytheists had not denied the existence of God. What they had done was mould Him in the image of insensate objects. Finding it difficult to fathom a God that could not be seen, they depicted Him in material or human forms and made these visible objects the focus of their attention. The objects they chose to revere were invariably things that appeared great to them, so when the prophets came, they failed to achieve public recognition, for they appeared in the guise of ordinary people. No historical greatness was attached to them when they came to the world. It was only much later that they came to be considered national heroes.

Part of Abraham's prayer when he commenced the construction of the Kaaba in Makkah went like this:

And remember when Abraham said: "Lord, make this town one of peace. Preserve my descendants and me from serving idols. Lord, they have led many men astray. He that follows me shall surely belong to me, but if anyone turns against me, You are surely Forgiving, Merciful. Lord, I have settled some of my offspring in a barren valley near Your Sacred House, so that they may observe the prayer...”<sup>61</sup>

Polytheism had reached its zenith in Abraham’s time. Wherever one turned, great monuments glorifying idols were to be found. It appeared impossible for the human intellect to rid itself of the shackles of polytheistic thought. At this time, Abraham was commanded to settle in Makkah and start a new line of descent. God’s purpose was to raise a people in a land without polytheistic influence so that a nation with minds elevated enough to shun externals and think in terms of profound realities could develop. The Quran characterizes the final product of this human progeny in the following words:

God had endeared the Faith to you and beautified it in your hearts, making unbelief, wrongdoing and disobedience abhorrent to you. Such are rightly guided.<sup>62</sup>

We can only understand this verse if we consider the situation that prevailed one and a half thousand years ago when the Companions adopted the Faith. It was surrounded by a host of visible “gods” that took an invisible God as their own; from many worldly greats, they recognized and believed in a prophet who commanded no worldly stature. Islam at that time was a religion strange to the world, but it was this outlandish religion that the Companions grew to love so much that they were willing to renounce everything for it. In short, they saw the truth when it was still an abstract force before the ratification of history backed it up before it had become a symbol of national pride. One had to be ready to give everything for it and to expect nothing in return.

One outstanding example of the selflessness involved in faith at that time was the event known as bay'at 'aqbah thaniyah (The Second Oath of Allegiance), which was made before the Prophet emigrated to Madinah. Just when persecution of Muslims in Makkah had reached intolerable levels, some of them started spreading the message of Islam in Madinah, and soon it reached every home there. At that time, some of the people of Madinah resolved to go to Makkah, swear allegiance to the Prophet, and invite him to emigrate to Madinah. Jabir al-Ansari later recalled how, when Islam had spread to every house of Madinah, they held consultations among themselves. "How long can we let the Prophet wander around the hills of Makkah, fearful and distressed?" They said to one another. To those who judged from appearances alone, the fact that the Prophet was alone, with few supporters, was proof of his not being in the right: how could he be God's prophet and be left in such an abject state? But the people of Madinah looked at the matter more profoundly. They had realized the truth of his prophethood and saw that helping him, they would earn God's grace and good favour.

Seventy representatives of the people of Madinah took this oath of allegiance. We can tell under what precarious conditions they did so from the account of one of their number, Ka'b ibn Malik. He speaks of how they surreptitiously joined a regular party of pilgrims belonging to their tribe, pretending they were also going on a pilgrimage. Near Makkah, the Muslims pretended to have fallen asleep when the others put up camp. However, when a third of the night had elapsed, they rose quietly from their beds to keep their appointment with the Prophet, proceeding to rendezvous "like birds, creeping silently in the undergrowth."<sup>63</sup>

What an extraordinary time it must have been when, with the Prophet rejected by the world, a few individuals arose, eager to follow him. At that time, the Prophet had no place in his hometown; he had been chased out of Ta'if with a volley of stone-throwing and abuse; no tribe was willing to grant him protection. Yet, under such adverse conditions, the people of Madinah recognized the truth of his prophethood and responded to his call. When the Ansar<sup>64</sup> went forward to swear allegiance, one rose and asked: "Do you know what your oath of allegiance will entail? It will entail the destruction of your properties and homes." "We know," they replied, "and it is an oath entailing the destruction of our properties and homes that we are entering." They then asked the Prophet: "What will be our reward if we are faithful till the end?"

“Paradise,” the Prophet replied. “Give us your hand,” they said to the Prophet, “so we can swear allegiance to you.”

The Ansar, en-masse, were giving their lives for a truth that was still disputed, for a reality that had found no place in the world of humanity. It was an act which no community had ever emulated before or after them.

Avoiding Extraneous Issues

It is generally the issues that are called nationalistic in modern terminology that capture the imagination of a people's intelligentsia and lead to the establishment of popular movements. Issues of this nature faced the Prophet Muhammad also, but he scrupulously avoided them. The success of his mission depended upon his conforming to the scheme of God, which had been evolving over the last two and a half thousand years. If he had become involved in irrelevant side issues, all the opportunities, which had been created, could have been ruined.

The Arab border territory of Yemen had come under Ethiopian rule in A.D. 525, and Abrahah was appointed governor. This audacious individual attacked the Holy Ka'bah, aiming to demolish it and end the central position it enjoyed because it was a pilgrimage place. The year of his attack on the Ka'bah, with an army of elephants, was also the year of the Prophet's birth (A.D. 571): the year of the Sassanians' attack on Yemen and its assimilation into the Persian Empire. Bazan became the new governor. When the Prophet Muhammad commenced his mission, the Persian emperor heard about him and instructed Bazan to order the new prophet to desist from his claims; “Otherwise,” the emperor said, “bring me his head.”<sup>65</sup>

This shows how great the problems posed by foreign domination on the borders of Arabia had become when the Prophet Muhammad commenced his mission. The Prophet could have incited his people to rise against the foreign invaders and drive them out of the Arabian territory. But to have done so would have been contrary to God’s scheme. It was His will that the Prophet should not clash with others over peripheral issues but should concentrate on the central theme of his mission, which was to spread the word of God. As history bears witness, the consequence was that Bazan, as well as most Christians residing in Yemen, accepted Islam. What a leader in his place taking up national issues would have attempted to solve unscrupulously through political activities, the Prophet successfully solved by communicating to others the ideas of Islam.

After the death of Abu Talib, Abu Lahab became the leader of the Banu Hashim tribe. Since the new chieftain refused protection to the Prophet, the latter was forced to seek the patronage of some other tribe. For this purpose, he visited many tribes, including the frontier-based Banu Shayban ibn Tha’labah. The chief of this tribe, Musanna ibn Harithah, explained to the Prophet that his people lived close to the Persian border, a territory which the Sassanian Emperor had allowed them to occupy only on receiving assurance that they would not preach any new doctrine or give refuge to anyone who did so. “Perhaps rulers would disapprove of your teachings,” the chieftain added.<sup>66</sup>

This shows how foreign rule on the borders of Arabia constituted more than a political and territorial encroachment on Arab sovereignty; it also obstructed the Prophet’s missionary work. The Prophet could have used this as a pretext for starting active resistance to foreign powers, saying that no missionary work could be accomplished until all external obstructions had been eliminated. But to do so in the initial stages of his mission would have constituted a deviation from God’s scheme, which was for the empires of Rome and Persia to become weak by fighting each other for twenty years. Then, when the time finally came for them to be conquered, they had to shoulder the blame for initiating hostilities. It was, furthermore, relatively easy for the Muslims to subdue them, paving the way for the unprecedented conquests of the post-prophetic era. If the Muslims had confronted Rome and Persia prematurely, when these empires were strong and weak, the outcome would have been the opposite.

Fitting in with God’s Scheme

If a farmer is to grow crops, he must fit his cogwheel in with God’s. Providence has created unique opportunities for crop cultivation on earth, but to avail of them, there are certain things that a farmer must do. For instance, on the earth’s surface lies a layer of fertile soil, which is unique in the entire universe. But this soil, despite its innate fertility, will not yield a crop unless it is moist: the barrenness of the earth's arid regions is due to a lack of such moisture. Now there is nothing in the universe which will broadcast this fact to farmers; they must find it out for themselves by reading the silent signs of nature and then acting upon them. What a discerning farmer will do, then, is wait until the ground is moistened by rain before planting. If there is no rain, he will irrigate his land. So will the great disseminator of truth. He will wait for or create the right conditions to plant the seeds of truth in the hearts of humanity. This was the method followed by the Prophet Muhammad. The spiritual ground of Arabia he came from was moist and fertile, ready to produce great fruits. Still, the Prophet had to employ the correct methods for his mission to advance; he had to fit in with God's scheme to achieve success. There was no other way for him to utilize the opportunities provided.

The basic principle of the Prophet's teaching mission was that emphasis should be laid entirely on matters about eternity. Under no circumstances was his teaching to dwell on worldly issues. The actual issue confronting man is that of his eternal fate. All other matters are transitory and superfluous. Material success and failure have no meaning, for they are bound to end. In the next world, where success and failure will be abiding, that man should focus his attention.

Furthermore, the Prophet aimed to build a society of upright individuals, and such a society can only be formed

if each separate individual behaves with moral rectitude. Proper and consistent morality can come only from a profound belief in the hereafter. Belief in the hereafter means that we are not free to act as we please but will expect to be taken to task for our actions by God. It rids one of the wayward attitudes and makes one a disciplined and responsible human being. If one reads the Quran and the teachings of the Prophet with an open mind, one will find that life after death receives the most attention. Other matters are mentioned, but only incidentally. The purpose of the Prophet's mission was to direct people's attention towards the hereafter.

The Prophet's second principle was to avoid any material conflict between himself scrupulously—the teacher—and those to whom he was addressing his teachings. No matter what price had to be paid, he would let no worldly rivalry come in between himself and his congregation. One outstanding example of this policy was the Treaty of Hdaybiyyah. By constantly waging war against the Muslims, the Quraysh had made Muslims and non-Muslims into two parties eternally at loggerheads. Both sides were spending all their time preparing for and engaging in warfare. In this treaty, the Prophet accepted all the Quraysh's demands in return for a ten-year truce. The treaty's terms were so one-sided that many Muslims considered it a humiliation; in reality, it paved the way for what the Quran called a "clear victory."<sup>67</sup> This treaty ended the atmosphere of confrontation which had developed between Muslims and non-Muslims. Muslims could now freely communicate the teachings of their faith to non-Muslims, who, in turn, were free to accept them. No worldly rivalry or prejudice now stood in the way of disseminating the faith. After this treaty and the calming effect it had on non-Muslims, the message of Islam spread rapidly throughout Arabia. In just two years, the number of Muslims increased tenfold. There had seemed no way that Makkah could ever be conquered by force of arms, yet it succumbed two years later to the strength of Islamic teachings.

A critical aspect of the Prophet's method was compassion towards his foes, even when they were wholly at his mercy. This was because he did not look upon anyone as an enemy; he saw all men and women as potential recipients of Islamic teachings and was keen to give them every possible chance to accept the faith. One outstanding example of this magnanimity, which the Prophet displayed throughout his life, can be found in his treatment of the Quraysh after Makkah had been conquered. The people who had been relentlessly persecuting the Prophet and his followers for the previous twenty years were now at the Prophet's mercy. But, rather than punish them for past crimes, he forgave them all. When the Quraysh were brought before him in chains, he said to them, "Be on your way: you are all free men." He pronounced suspended death sentences on some, but these were freed when they appealed for clemency, personally or through representatives. Seventeen people were sentenced to death, but only five —those who did not appeal—were executed. In the Battle of Uhud, the Prophet's uncle, Hamzah, was slain by Wahshi ibn Barb, after which Hind bint 'Utbah mutilated Hamzah's corpse. When the Prophet learnt of this, he said, in the heat of the movement, "If God makes me triumph over them, then I will mutilate three of them."<sup>68</sup>

Wahshi and Hind were among the seventeen the Prophet condemned to death. But when they appealed to him for clemency, he forgave them both. This is because it was God's will that His Prophet is lenient and forgiving towards his enemies, for this policy harmonized with God's scheme to further the Islamic cause.

This principle is based on a profound insight into the nature of human society. Human society is a composite body of live, sensitive individuals in whom an urge for vengeance is kindled when one of their numbers is harmed. Human beings are unlike pieces of stone, which show no reaction when another stone is broken. To suppress one individual is to invite rebellion from those associated with him, which means that the time, which could be profitably spent on building up society, is frittered away in containing discontent. By forgiving all his past enemies after the conquest of Makkah, the Prophet ensured that at no future date would insurrection rear its head. Most of those he forgave accepted Islam and became a source of strength to it, one instance being that of 'Ikrimah, the son of Abu Jahl, formerly an implacable adversary of the Prophet and his followers.

Once the Prophet's authority had been established, specific social reforms had to be undertaken. However, the Prophet was careful to proceed gradually in introducing such reform; he never hastened to impose measures when people were not ready to accept them.

The people of Makkah were heirs to the religion of Abraham, but they had distorted the true faith of Abraham and taken up various kinds of innovatory practices. For instance, in the time of Abraham, Hajj (pilgrimage) used to be performed in the lunar month of Dhu'l-Hijjah. Since a year according to the lunar calendar is eleven days shorter than a solar year, so its months do not revolve around the seasons. Hajj, then, sometimes fell in one season and sometimes in another. This went against the Quraysh's commercial interests. They wanted Hajj to fall in the summer each year, and for this purpose, they adopted a method known as nasi'. This consisted of adding eleven days to the lunar calendar every year. After this intercalation, they maintained the names of the lunar months, but in effect, their calendar was a solar one. This meant that for thirty-three years, all dates were removed from their actual place in the lunar calendar; every thirty-three years, when their annual addition of eleven days to the calendar had run the course of an entire year, Hajj would be performed on its proper date according to the lunar calendar.

One of the tasks entrusted to the Prophet was to end all the Quraysh's innovations and have Hajj performed according to Abraham's original system. The conquest of Makkah occurred in the month of Ramadan, A.H. 8. The Prophet was now the ruler of the whole of Arabia. He could have put an immediate end to all the Quraysh's innovations. But instead, he bided his time. There were just two years remaining until the completion of the full thirty-three-year course of nasi'. The Prophet waited for these two years, and although he was the conqueror of Makkah, he did not perform Hajj during that time. Only in the third year after the conquest of Makkah (A.H. 10) did he participate in the pilgrimage. That was the year when Hajj was performed on the correct date of Dhu'l-Hijjah, in accordance with the system established by Abraham. This was the Prophet's farewell pilgrimage, and during it, he announced that, in future, Hajj would be conducted the same way as in that year. Thus he ended the manipulation of the lunar calendar for all time. "Time has run its full course," he announced. "It is now in the same position as when God created the heavens and the earth. And there are twelve months to a year in the sight of God."<sup>69</sup>

There was a profound reason for the Prophet's delay in introducing this reform. People who have adhered to a particular religious practice for many years consider it sacred and find it extremely difficult to change their thinking. In two years, Hajj would fall on the day desired by the Prophet, so he avoided taking any premature initiatives, which would have made an issue of the matter. When the time came for Hajj to fall naturally on its proper day, he announced that this was the right day of the year for Hajj to be performed, and it would continue to be performed on the same day.

These examples show how the Prophet's entire policy was moulded by the wisdom God had endowed him with. One can say that he fitted his cog-wheel in with God's; his every move was designed to be in accordance with the pattern set by God. It was for this reason that all his efforts produced highly fruitful results.

RISING ABOVE EVENTS

The Arabian Peninsula, in the period immediately preceding the coming of the Prophet Muhammad, was confronted with immense political problems. The two superpowers of the day—the empires of Rome and Persia—lay to the west and east of the Arabian Peninsula, and both had turned the land of the Arabs into their political playground. The most fertile regions of the peninsula were under the direct control of one or the other of these two powers. The Persians had annexed Iraq, while Syria, Jordan, Palestine and Lebanon had become part of the Byzantine Empire. Despite the natural protective boundaries of the Red Sea to the west and the Persian Gulf to the east, the lands bordering these seas were not immune from intrusions by their powerful neighbours. Persian warships had no difficulty crossing the Gulf of Oman and entering Arab territory. The Red Sea also posed no barrier to interference in Arab affairs from Egypt and Ethiopia, both under the control of the Byzantine Empire.

Tribal chieftains had set up states in the inner regions of the Arabian Peninsula, but they, too, enjoyed no real independence. The dominance of Rome and Persia meant that these chieftains could preserve some autonomy by ruling as vassals for these imperial powers. On the borders of Syria lay the state of Ghasasina Arabiya, subject to the Roman Empire was governed by Harith ibn Abi Shimir Ghassani at the time of the Prophet Muhammad's mission. Then there was Busra which, besides being under the political control of the Romans, had also been subjected to Roman cultural influence, with many of its inhabitants accepting Christianity.

On the Iraq border lay the state of Hirah 'Arabiyah, which was subject to Iran. There were also several states bordering the Persian Gulf, in which the influence of their Persian neighbour was strongly felt. Foremost among them was Bahrayn, ruled by Mundhir ibn Sawa, where many of the inhabitants had accepted the Zoroastrian religion. Two other states to have come under Persian influence in this way were 'Amman, ruled by the two sons of Jalandi—Jaifar and 'Abd—and Yamamah, ruled by Hauzah ibn 'Ali al-Hanafi. The rivalry between the Persian and Roman empires was intense, and their respective vassals in Arabia would participate in the wars fought between them. Ghasasina, for instance, would side with the Romans and Hirah with the Persians. So it was that Arab blood would flow in pursuit of the superpowers' aims.

In those times, Yemen was far larger than it is today. It contained several small tribal governments, the largest of which had its capital at Sana'a. It was there that Najran was situated. Foreign rule in Yemen commenced around A.D. 343 when the Romans sent Christian missionaries to the region. These missionaries met with great success in Najran, and most of the country's inhabitants converted to Christianity.

Though this was a religious event, the Romans' rivals in Persia perceived it as a political threat. It seemed to them as if the Roman Empire sought to establish a foothold in the southern region of Arabia. So the Persians allied with the Jewish tribes who had settled in Yemen after being expelled from Syria by the Romans in A.D. 70. Yusuf Dhu Nuwas was an Arab by birth but had accepted Judaism. With Persian help, he set up a semi-autonomous government in Sana'a under the sponsorship of the Sasanians. He then set about exterminating the Christians of Najran, many of whom were burnt alive in A.D. 534.

The Romans now took steps to preserve their hold on the region. Ostensibly seeking to protect the Yemenese Christians, they chose the Ethiopian king Najashi, a Christian loyal to the Romans, to fulfil their ends and incited him to rise against Yusuf Dhu Nuwas. Najashi then sent an army to Yemen under the Ethiopian chieftain Aryat. A short battle ensued, which ended with San'a' being captured by the Ethiopian force and Dhu Nuwas drowning himself in the sea. Before long, however, Abrahah—a soldier in Aryat's army—killed his commander and, having gained Najashi's consent, set up his government in San'a'. It was he who, in A.D. 571, set out to attack the Holy Ka'bah in Makkah. He was succeeded by his sons, first Yaksum and then Masruq.

A member of the former royal family of Yemen, Sayf ibn Dhi-Yazan, was then urged to expel foreigners from his country and re-establish his ancestors' dynasty. He started a freedom movement, but when local support proved insufficient to achieve his aims, he went to the Iranian king Nawshyrwan for military aid. Nawshyrwan quickly seized this golden opportunity: while an Iranian army under Dahraz was being prepared to advance on Yemen, Sayf ibn Dhi-Yazan died, but his son Ma'di Karb completed the arrangement for bringing the Iranian force to his country. Crossing the Gulf of Oman, they landed at Hadhramawt and proceeded to Sana'a. The alliance between Ma'di Karb and Dahraz successfully expelled the Ethiopians from Yemen. Ma'di Karb became king of Sana'a, but an Iranian military presence was retained, turning Yemen into a trans-oceanic Iranian province. There was an Iranian governor there at the time of the advent of Islam. His name was Bazan, and after initial opposition, he later accepted Islam.

All this shows how far Arabian territory had fallen prey to the expansionist designs of Rome and Persia at the time of the Prophet Muhammad's mission. In such a situation, two paths were open to a reformer like the Prophet. He could have allowed himself to be carried by current events and initiated political agitation against the colonial powers threatening his land. Or he could have concentrated on building up his people's internal strength to such a degree that, with a slight effort on their part, the imperial edifice would crumble to the ground.

The Prophet chose the second rather than the first course. Abraha's attack on the Holy Ka'bah is mentioned in the two chapters (105 and 106) of the Quran entitled al-Fil and Quraysh. The Quran explicitly states that such threats should be countered by “worship.” This is the Islamic way. When a political threat is perceived, a solution should be sought—not on a political level—but on a spiritual level, on a level of worship.

THE PROPHETIC METHOD

Strengthening Oneself Inwardly

The story of Islam began in A.D. 610 when the Prophet Muhammad received his first revelation. At that time, he was the only Muslim, the only believer, in the whole world. In A.D. 622, the Prophet emigrated from Makkah to Madinah. There he established an Islamic state, but its boundaries were limited. They extended only to a few parts of the small town of Madinah, the larger portion remaining under the control of Jewish tribes and Arabs who had not yet converted to Islam. The Prophet died eleven years later. By his death, the frontiers of Islam had spread throughout the Arabian Peninsula and reached southern Palestine. An Islamic empire covering 1 million square miles had come into existence. Islam had advanced through North Africa to Spain on the western front in just under one century and from Spain to the frontiers of China in the east. There are still signs of Islamic influence in such far-off places as Budapest, where a Muslim shrine, "Gul Baba," still stands on the banks of the river Danube, and France, where many church steeples contain stones with Arabic engravings—a remnant of the 8th century A.H. when southern France was a European province of the Caliph in Damascus.

Two hundred years before, the people of Arabia had been driving camels; now, they were leading the world. Baghdad had become the centre of the civilized world, taking over from Seleucia, Persepolis, Babylon and Rome as the major international seat of learning.

These outstanding triumphs were the result of a straightforward programme, which the Quran explains in these words:

You who are wrapped up in your vestment arise and give warning. Magnify your Lord, cleanse your garments, and keep away from all pollution. Bestow no favours expecting a gain. Be patient, for your Lord's sake.<sup>70</sup>

When summarized, this programme can be divided into three stages:

1. Personal reform, so that one worships God alone, corrects one's moral standards and avoids all forms of sin and wrongdoing.
2. Impressing on others the reality of their existence and final destiny—that they are God's servants and will return to Him after death.
3. Remaining steadfast in the face of difficulties which afflict one in one's attempt to reform both oneself and Society.

Inward Strength

The Islamic struggle is personal, motivated by an overpowering urge for salvation in the next world, a longing that God should forgive us when we come before Him. When Islam penetrates the depths of our consciousness, we become concerned with one thing alone: how to earn God's favour and forgiveness. We immediately seek to mould our faith, ideas, character, actions, and all we do in life, following our overriding concern to avoid displeasing God. It is on the hereafter that we focus all our attention. We call others to Islam, making sure that we are first good Muslims ourselves:

Say: "I was commanded to be the first to submit to Him."<sup>71</sup>

Regarding its motivation, becoming the "first to submit to God" is an entirely personal affair. But in its consequences, this act has far-reaching implications for society. A volcanic eruption starts within a mountain, invisible to the eyes of humankind. But when the eruption occurs, it illuminates the surrounding area with its glow. So it is with those who first submit to God. The transformation that occurs within them has repercussions on their entire environment. The exact sequence can be found in the revelation of the Quran. The initial verses to be revealed were those dealing with personal reform. Later came the chapters dealing with the improvement of society at large. Comparing this sequence with the method adopted by the Prophet of Islam, Muhammad Marmaduke Pickthall, in the introduction to his translation of the Quran, writes:

The inspiration of the Prophet progressed from inward things to outward things.<sup>72</sup>

Generally, people consider assaults on the outside world to be the most worthwhile task in life. But the lesson of the Prophet's life is that one should work to strengthen oneself inwardly. Individuals who have consolidated themselves from within become irresistible when they break out into the open. How is it that a person becomes strengthened inwardly? The Quran does not give us any magical prescription for achieving this purpose. Faith, righteous actions and steadfast perseverance can only attain it. Firstly, divine truths should be embedded in our hearts and minds. We should try to fix our thoughts on the next world, the world of eternal realities. We should cultivate the attitude that we have no rights in life, only responsibilities. Difficulties are bound to arise as we pursue the divine path. Rather than seek to lay the blame for them on others, we should bear them in a spirit of quiet and humble acceptance. These are the qualities that consolidate inward strength. The Prophet Muhammad gave us a perfect example of cultivating these qualities. He developed them to such a degree that no one could withstand the force of his character. When the Prophet exploded on the outside world, almost all of the known world capitulated before him. People succumbed before his inspired character, for the strength of his personality came from within.

In his article entitled "Bravery," the renowned Hindi writer, Sardar Pooran Singh (1882-1932), called the Prophet Muhammad the bravest man in history. So he had to be to bring about such a great revolution in the Arabian Peninsula. His greatness can be judged because anyone who met him accepted him as his master. What kind of bravery is this which makes one so powerful? In the words of Pooran Singh:

To strive every moment, every hour, towards making oneself greater and greater is bravery. It is the cowards who say, "Go ahead." While the brave say, "Step back" (move backwards). Cowards say, "raise the sword," while the brave say, "bring your head forward! The policy of the brave is to gather and increase strength from all quarters. The brave build up their inner reserves, marching ahead within themselves. They can move the entire world by moving people's hearts. Bravery does not consist of becoming emotionally overwrought and cooling off like a piece of tin that heats up and cools off in no time. The fire may keep burning for centuries yet will not heat the brave, while centuries of snow may not be enough to dampen the chill, even the tip of the brave. People say, "Act, act, work, work", but all such talks seem futile. First, create and gather the strength for work. It is pointless to shout, Act, act, act! Without first creating and gathering the strength for work. One must grow and root oneself deep like a tree within oneself. The world does not stand on a heap of garbage where any cock can win fame and acclaim by mere crowing. Instead, the eternal principles of religious and spiritual truths bear the world. Whosoever fully associates with these truths emerges victorious.<sup>73</sup>

The secret of this bravery does not lie in magical prescriptions or spiritual exercises undertaken in seclusion. Practices in the occult can delude into the world of matter, but they are useless to people grappling with the day-to-day problems that confront them. Real strength is that which leads us to overcome the difficulties of life.

People develop inner strength when they become free of all selfish ties when they attain a level of thinking in which all superficial considerations are cast aside and, as the Prophet put it, "they see things as they are." Their thoughts and actions are not guided by prejudice, anger, greed, hate, the lust for power, vanity, self-interest or any such base urge. This is what makes for a strength of character. It is an irresistible force that enables a person to face every test. The initiatives of those endowed with inward strength are inevitably seen through to their conclusion. They make allowances for all eventualities, both probable and possible, in their decision-making. The more people oppose them, the more they adhere to their position of truth and righteousness.

An example of how the Prophet Muhammad's inner strength provided solutions to all the problems that faced him can be found in the situation that developed after the conquest of Makkah. His strength of spirit manifested itself in different ways as the need arose. Sometimes it took the form of forgiveness, sometimes supreme courage, and sometimes trust in God. Sometimes his success was due to farsightedness. Sometimes he showed how one who disavows self-interest becomes an invincible force who gains all by forsaking everything.

After the Prophet Muhammad had captured Makkah in A.H. 8, some of the Quraysh fled to the tribes of Hawazin and Thaqif and incited them to start a new war against the Muslims. The tribes responded by mobilizing all their human resources and amassing a force of 20,000 men. They met the Muslims on the field of Hunayn. The archers of Hawazin had concealed themselves in a ravine, and when they rained their arrows down on the Muslims, about 11,000 of the 12,000-strong army turned and fled. Yet, despite this initial setback, the Muslims finally won an extraordinary victory. The reason for their recovery was the inner strength of their leader, the Prophet Muhammad, who, at this critical juncture, showed no signs of panic, but was the epitome of “tranquillity”<sup>74</sup> and remained full of trust in God. Once his inner strength came out into the open, he immediately altered the course of battle. Standing up in the very midst of the enemy, he called out to his panicking followers:

I am the Prophet, and I do not lie:

I am the grandson of ‘Abdul Muttalib.

“To me, servants of God!” the Prophet called. His cousin Ibn ‘Abbas, had a loud voice. The Prophet asked him to appeal to the fleeing soldiers: “You who swore allegiance to the Prophet in the shadow of the Ridwan tree: you swore that you would give your lives for the Faith! Where are you now?” When the Muslims saw their leader standing firm in the face of the enemy, they realized that God's help was with him. Their flagging spirits were rekindled, and they returned with a new determination to the field of battle. So unbounded was their new-found enthusiasm that they would not even wait for their floundering camels to turn around: they jumped off the backs of their mounts and ran back to the battlefield on foot. Suddenly the course of the battle changed. Now it was the enemy's turn to take flight. The Muslims won the day, along with booty amounting to 24,000 camels, 40,000 goats and 40,000 ounces of silver. They also took some 6,000 prisoners.

Despite this victory, the situation continued to deteriorate. The Thaqif were the second most prominent tribe in the whole of Arabia. They also owned the only fortified town on the peninsula. They were now besieged in Ta'if, but during the three weeks of sieges, they inflicted more losses on the Muslims than they had received at Hunayn. Moreover, their opposition to Islam was so deep-rooted that when one of their number, 'Urwah ibn Mas'ud Thaqafi—who was reputed to be "dearer to his people than sweet maidens"—came to the Prophet and accepted Islam, they forgot their previous affection for him, and cruelly riddled him with arrows.

Once again, the Prophet's inner strength came to his rescue. As the siege was tightened, 'Umar asked the Prophet to pray for the destruction of the people of Ta'if; instead, the Prophet prayed for their guidance. He was entirely free of anger and prejudice in this treatment of them. Finally, after besieging the town for three weeks, he ordered his army to retreat. On his return from Ta'if, the Prophet reached Ji'ranah, where the spoils of the Battle of Hunayn had been stored. Here the Prophet had an opportunity to take reprisals against the Thaqifs ally, Hawazin. But he did quite the opposite, accepting an appeal from a delegation of that tribe for the release of all their six thousand prisoners. His magnanimous treatment of them—he set them free and gave them clothes and provisions for their journey—was bound to make an impression on them. And it did: the whole Hawazin tribe accepted Islam, won over by the Prophet's unbounded generosity.

The effects of this event were also felt in Ta'if. The Hawazin and the Thaqif were two branches of one large tribe. The Thaqif felt much more threatened by the Hawazin's conversion to Islam than they had been by the siege of their city. The severance of the Hawazin from their alliance was a mortal wound, which they knew would render them incapable of doing battle with the Muslims:

The Thaqif consulted among themselves. They saw that they would not now be able to fight against all the Arabs around them who had sworn allegiance to the Prophet and accepted his Faith.<sup>75</sup>

In A.H. 9 (A.D. 630), a delegation from Ta'if arrived in Madinah. They were willing to accept Islam, but only under certain unusual conditions. For example, they denied the right of passage to the Muslim army through their territory; they refused to pay land tax; they declined to participate in jihad; they also said that they would not pray or recognize any ruler who was not from their tribe. The Prophet accepted all their conditions but clarified that there was no good in a religion which did not include bowing down to God. The Companions were amazed that the Prophet should accept their Islam, along with all these reservations. But the Prophet was looking further into the future and put their minds at rest with these words:

Once they have submitted to God, they will, after a while, give alms and strive in the path of God.<sup>76</sup>

Imam Ahmad had related, on the authority of Anas ibn Malik, that the Prophet used to grant any request that people made before they accepted Islam. For example, one person who came to the Prophet was given a herd of goats so large that they stretched from one mountain to another. He then returned to his people and urged them to accept Islam, “for Muhammad gives in such abundance that one need never go wanting again.” But, as Ibn Kathir has pointed out, even if a person came to the Prophet seeking only the world before a day had passed, he would transform: the Prophet’s Faith would become dearer to him than all the world has to offer.

Once the Thaqif and the Hawazin had been settled, another more severe problem reared. The Muslims had accumulated a massive stock of booty in the victory over the Hawazin. The Prophet distributed these spoils among the new Makkan converts with incredible generosity. However, some of the Ansar—who had helped the Prophet when he emigrated to their town—found this hard to bear. It seemed to them that, now that the Prophet was re-established in his hometown, he had adopted a chauvinistic attitude and was showering his people with riches to please them. There is no doubt that the Prophet was above such base motivations, but the resentment that the Ansar felt at being left out was natural enough and posed severe problems for Muslim unity. The Prophet's sincerity of purpose, however, showed in the emphatic manner in which he removed their doubts.

The Prophet called all the Ansar together in a courtyard and addressed them in the following manner: "What is this that I hear about you? Is it not a fact you were lost, and God guided you, through me, to the right path? Whatever you needed, He granted you in abundance--again through me. You were at war with one another, and God brought you together as one people around me?" Everyone shouted out their agreement. Then the Prophet continued:

You have every right to say that we Muhajirs came to you as refugees, expelled from our land, and sheltered us; we were in need, and you looked after us; we were terrorized and made us secure, friendless, and you gave us company. Tell me, helpers, are you resentful just because I have given some new converts a trivial gift to raise their spirits and make them secure in the Faith while entrusting you with the great gift God has bestowed upon you—that is Islam? Company of Helpers, are you not happy to see people take camels and goats home with them while you return home with the Messenger of God?<sup>77</sup>

On hearing this speech, everyone broke down and wept. “We are happy with the Messenger of God!” they cried in unison. In this way, the Prophet’s inner strength broke down every barrier, opened every door and surmounted every obstacle. It was his key to success in every situation in life.

The External Target: Missionary Activity

When the Prophet Muhammad started his active struggle, he was not motivated by any urge to revenge himself on an outside world that had mistreated him. Usually, popular movements are sparked by some instinct for revenge, but the Prophet’s struggle was based on positive concepts of its own; it was not a negative reaction to an event or how others had treated him. Indeed, all the circumstances, which usually cause political, social and economic reactions, leading to the establishment of popular movements, were present in full force when the Prophet was sent to the world. But it was not these points that the Prophet dwelt on in his communication of the Faith. He pursued his aims unremittingly, according to the programme mentioned at the beginning of this chapter, but he did so without clashing with anyone on political, social or economic issues.

When the Prophet commenced his mission, the land of the Arabs had become a prime target for attacks by the imperial powers of the day, who had been incredibly swift in annexing the comparatively fertile and prosperous parts of the country. Syria was under Roman rule in the north of the peninsula, governed by Arab chieftains who owed allegiance to Caesar. In the southern territory of Yemen, the Persians held sway and ruled during the time of the Prophet by a governor named Bazan. The only regions to have retained their independence were Hijaz, Tahamah and Najd. Besides, these were only rocky deserts, with the occasional oasis in the wilderness. The Caesars and the Khusraus considered Arabia their property: that was why, when the Prophet wrote to the Emperor of Persia inviting him to accept Islam, that proud monarch tore up his letter and said indignantly:

He writes to me—and he is my slave!

Abraham's attack on the Ka'bah in the year of the Prophet's birth (A.D. 570) was part of this encroachment of foreign powers on Arab territory. Before the advent of Islam, the Ka'bah had been a centre of idol worship for the whole of Arabia: every tribe had erected its idol there and considered its precincts sacred. Throughout the year, people would flock to Makkah from far and wide to pay their respects to the Holy Ka'bah and make offerings to the idols lodged there. The economy of Makkah benefited greatly from this constant influx of pilgrims, and Abraham desired to divert this great source of wealth towards his land—Yemen, which lay southeast of Makkah. He was willing to resort to any means to achieve his ends by killing the previous Yemenese governor, taking over the country, and forcing the king of Abyssinia to recognize his authority in the province. A Christian by faith, Abrahah had built a massive church in Sana'a, after which he launched an intensive propaganda campaign to induce people to go on pilgrimages. In this way, he hoped to divert the lucrative pilgrim trade from Makkah to San'a'. It is recorded in Arab history that when all his efforts failed, he set out to destroy the Ka'bah so that people would have nowhere to make their pilgrimage to, save the church he had built in Sana'a. For this purpose, he took an army of elephants, which gained him the name "Lord of the Elephants." Even the names of some of the people who built his church are known. The Arabs called the road he passed along, 'The Road of the Elephants.' The spring from which they drank, the gate through which they entered Makkah and the year of their attack were also similarly named.

What most leaders would have done under such adverse conditions was raise a popular movement against the political threat of foreign imperial powers. They would have sought to rid their land of the yoke of foreign domination and revived the nationalistic instincts of their people. But the Prophet of Islam refrained completely from instigating any nationalistic freedom struggle of this nature.

There were also critical economic problems facing Arabia when the Prophet came to the world. Arabia was an almost entirely arid land: in an agrarian age, it had no agricultural foundation on to base its economy. This problem affected every individual in the land and could easily have provided the incentive for a popular revolutionary movement. But the Prophet did not capitalize on the economic issues of his people in any way. On one occasion, the Makkan gentry gathered before the Ka'bah after sunset and summoned the Prophet. When he laid the basic teachings of Islam before them, this is how they reacted to his message:

Muhammad, you know that no country is poorer or drier than ours. You know how hard it is for us to make a living. So pray to your Lord on our behalf that He should remove these dry mountains that have made life so difficult for us; that He should make our land fertile and make rivers, like those of Syria and Iraq, flow in its valleys.<sup>78</sup>

To understand what made the leaders of the Quraysh speak to the Prophet in this manner, one has to understand the geographical situation of Arabia. A chain of mountains stretching along the coastline of Hijaz as far as Najd prevented sea winds from penetrating inland, resulting in rainfall in the Arabian Peninsula, in contrast to that of Iraq and Syria, which was minimal. This geographical situation was at the root of Arabia's economic problems. Any budding leader could instantly attract people's attention by exploiting these problems. The Prophet, however, did not choose this path. He did not pay any direct attention to issues of this nature and devoted his efforts entirely towards preaching the oneness of God. History shows that the Prophet's struggle in the field of missionary activity had far-reaching effects, opening up new opportunities for the Arabs in political and economic areas. But it is essential to realize that these advantages were an indirect result of the Prophet's struggle: it was not towards political and financial gain that he directed his efforts.

The Prophet's whole life shows that the matter to which he attached fundamental importance was preaching of the faith. As soon as he started his active mission, he laid aside all other issues and concentrated solely on propagating the message of Islam. First, he was determined to inform his kinsfolk that he had been chosen to communicate the word of God to humanity. For this purpose, he invited all his relatives—about forty were invited, at least thirty attended—to a dinner. After dinner, he addressed his guests but met with little success. "Banu Muttalib," he said, "I have been sent to you in particular, then to humanity as a whole. Who then will fulfil on my behalf my debts and my promises? Who will look after my family while I am away? Whoever does so will be my companion in paradise." The Prophet repeated his words, but only 'Ali, a young boy at the time, responded positively. "I will, Prophet of God," he said. "You, 'Ali, you, 'Ali!" came the Prophet's reply.<sup>79</sup>

Abu Jahal threw a stone at the Prophet one day, drawing blood from his face. The Prophet's uncle, 'Abbas, heard about this. Though Abbas had not accepted Islam then, family pride moved him to go and smite Abu Jahl in return. Then he returned to the Prophet, "Nephew," he said triumphantly, "I have taken your revenge." "It would make me happier if you accepted Islam," The Prophet replied.

Once, the leaders of the Quraysh came to Abu Talib, another of the Prophet's uncles. "Abu Talib," they said, "your nephew enters our arenas and gatherings and says things which upset us. Please, if you can manage it, stop him from doing so." Abu Talib sent his son, Aqil, to fetch the Prophet. When he told his nephew what the Quraysh had said, the Prophet raised his eyes to heaven. "By God," he said, "can anyone among you light a fire from a flame of the sun? Well, I can no longer forsake the message God Himself entrusted to me." Having said this, the Prophet broke down weeping.

The Banu Hashim, to which tribe the Prophet belonged, were the cream of Arab society. Since his tribe was already in a dominant position in Arabia, some people thought that perhaps the Prophet wanted to consolidate his authority and be crowned king. But the Prophet's actions showed he was interested in only one thing: to convey to people the importance of preparing themselves for the next world. So persistently would he emphasise this matter that sometimes the leaders of the Quraysh would plead with him in almost desperate terms to leave them alone. "Muhammad," Abu Jahl once said, "will you stop insulting our gods? If you want us to witness that you have communicated your message, then all right: we bear witness; you certainly have communicated it."

The Prophet, however, was undeterred and went on delivering his message. This infuriated the Quraysh further, and they decided to ostracize the whole Banu Hashim family. An interdict stopped intermarriage and commercial relations. On learning of this, the Banu Hashim moved to the place known as Shi'b Abi Talib. While this interdict was in force, preaching was confined to those affected, and the Prophet took full advantage of it. These restrictions, however, came to an end temporarily in the sacred months. The Prophet's family used to benefit from this period of respite in that they could conduct transactions. Then, gathering the meat of sacrifice, they would dry it for the rest of the year. But the Prophet would use this time differently: he would go to tents where various tribes were staying and communicate the message of Islam to them.

Imagine how precarious the Prophet's situation was when he emigrated from Makkah to Madinah. Yet even during this journey, he did not miss a single opportunity to preach Islam to those he encountered. When he reached Ghamim, for instance, he communicated the message of Islam to Baridah ibn Hasib, who then—along with eighty members of his family—accepted Islam. On reaching the mountain pass of Rakubah, he met two men whom he told about Islam and who accepted the Faith. When the Prophet asked them their names, they said they belonged to the tribe of Aslam and were bandits. For this reason, they explained, they were called “Muhanan” or “The Two Despicable Ones.” “No,” the Prophet told them, “you are two honourable ones.”<sup>80</sup>

The Prophet Muhammad inculcated in his companions the same attitude. It was not to be their aim to conquer territory or accumulate spoils of war. Instead, they were to become a source of wealth—the wealth of true faith—for others. So when the Prophet entrusted ‘Ali with the Muslim standard in the field of Khaybar, he told his cousin to proceed softly: “And when you reach their fields, call them to Islam and tell them what their responsibilities to God are. By God, if the Lord guides just one of them through you to Islam, then that will be better for you than a herd of red camels.”

Missionary activity was such a prominent part of the Prophet’s life that if one put his whole struggle under one heading, this would surely be the one. He did not concentrate on political, economic and social issues, as leaders usually do; instead, he devoted his entire time and energy to preaching the word of God. At first, it may have seemed that his single-mindedness was unjustified. But from the outcome of his efforts, it became apparent that worldly goals are automatically achieved if we set our sights on the next world—as the Prophet did.

Patience and Steadfastness

The third part of the Prophet’s mission, mentioned at the beginning of this chapter, was steadfast forbearance in the face of the difficulties encountered on the divine path. The Arabic word for patience is sabr. One of the words derived from the same root is sabbarah, meaning hard, unfertile ground, which does not accept any seed. Likewise, a patient endowed with sabr does not let events affect him, who never loses heart but pursues his goal with unflagging resolution. Courageous people are also called sabar, for they do not bend to pressure; they stand firm and uncompromising, no matter how adverse the circumstances may be.

Patience is the loftiest virtue that one who has adopted Islam as a cause can have. When Islam has become a vital part of our life, it imbues us with an undying spirit which enables us “never to lose heart on account of what befalls (us) in the path of God”—never to weaken or cringe abjectly.<sup>81</sup> To believe in God is to trust in Him absolutely, and one who trusts in God is the possessor of great strength: nothing can weaken their resolve.

Without patience, preachers of God’s word cannot continue their work for long. When they embark on their mission, they find they are alone in the company of strangers. They are restricted by God’s commandments, while others are free to do as they like. Everything they do is geared towards success and salvation in the next world, while all the avenues towards worldly success are open before their adversaries. All their efforts are concentrated on spiritual ends, while the political and economic expertise of others makes them strong in the eyes of men. They maintain strict ethical standards, while others’ actions are free of all restrictions. The preachers of God’s word can easily be affected by such matters. They may even be tempted to follow the madding crowd and give up their task. It may occur to them that if their actions are so ineffectual, they may as well spare themselves the trouble. This is where sabr comes to their rescue, preventing them from giving up just because their words seem not to affect others:

Therefore, have patience. God's promise is true. Let not those who have no certainty make you impatient.<sup>82</sup>

Sometimes, sabr takes on another form: steadfastness and forbearance in the face of persecution from others. This was the method adopted by all the prophets of God: They used to say to their adversaries:

... We will endure your persecution patiently. In God, let all the faithful put their trust.<sup>83</sup>

The afflictions beset preachers of God's word and are an integral part of their mission. Those they address are bound to show some reaction to their words, and sometimes it is going to be violent and uncompromising. If they start bemoaning their treatment by others, the very seriousness of their efforts to bring them to true faith is cast into doubt. Those who are working for God's sake will not be affected by the reactions of others to what they are doing. The difficulties we encounter in pursuit of God's good pleasure are a test of our sincerity. We cannot expect our words to affect others unless we have proved our sincerity.

When faced with enemy onslaughts, people usually take retaliatory measures of their own: People are generally used to retaliating when they face any unpleasant treatment by others. Sabr, on the other hand, means to bear patiently whatever is meted out by the enemy. For instance, if Muslims in a particular country find themselves up against the economic bias of their non-Muslim compatriots, the way of sabr is not to start demanding equal treatment but rather to make extra efforts to excel over others. Prejudice can only have an adverse effect when people of similar abilities compete for one job. If one of the contestants excels over the others in ability, then not even prejudice can deny him his rightful place.

When the Muslims were economically isolated in Makkah during the time of the Prophet, some emigrated to Abyssinia, thus consolidating their position. The people of Makkah had made it impossible for the Prophet's followers to continue trading. So the Muslims moved to a neighbouring country and pursued their livelihood there. So hardworking and honest were they in their dealings that Najashi, the king of Abyssinia, proclaimed that anyone who wronged a Muslim would have to compensate the wronged party 8 dirhams. This was just one of how God helped the Muslims re-establish themselves, considering their patience in the face of persecution by others.

Patience may appear to be a negative virtue, but as far as its results are concerned, it is a highly positive one. Once we have realized the value of sabr, we do not take immediate retaliatory measures against our oppressors; instead, we look further into the future and set in motion a series of events which lead to final success. Feelings run high when we have just been wronged. If we take immediate action, we may not be able to consider rationally what we should do: instead, we may act based on our emotions at the time. On the other hand, patience leads us coolly and objectively to consider all the possibilities open to us and the fundamental nature of the situation we have to deal with. We are then in a position to pursue a sound and solid policy. Impatience precipitates immediate action to contain the other party, while patience inclines us to wait for the eternal laws of nature devised by God to start working against our adversaries.

When we combat our enemy with impatience, we are spurred on by superficial motives and base emotions. As a result, we are bound to make mistakes and judgement errors, which only weaken our case. On the other hand, a divine strength—intelligence—is born within us when one is patient. Our intellect is a most extraordinary source of strength. It can look ahead, beyond temporary obstacles and barriers, and plan for the future. Intelligence frees one from negative impulses and enables one to think profoundly, penetrating the very depths of a situation. There we discover secrets, allowing us to control our rivals from all angles. He becomes like the quarry caught in the huntsman's net: movement only enmeshes him further and tightens the huntsman's hold on him.

The emigration from Makkah to Madinah exemplifies the Prophet's patience. When the Quraysh decided to kill the Prophet, he had two options: take up his sword in self-defence or leave Makkah for some safer abode. The Prophet adopted the second course of action. He coolly thought the situation over and decided to emigrate to Madinah, where he could continue the same work, only in a different place. According to 'Aisha, the Prophet came to their house every day before the emigration. There he would hold consultations with her father, Abu Bakr. Preparations were made, in the utmost secrecy, over six months. Everything went according to plan, and finally, the Prophet set out for Madinah, taking a dependable guide with him. From the point of view of a zealous Muslim political leader of the modern age, the emigration would appear as a flight, for what he would advocate in a similar situation would be a fight to the death; he would be looking no further ahead than making a martyr of himself. But if one looks at the results of the emigration of the Prophet, one can see that it was the most significant watershed in Islamic history.

Patience also enables us to refrain from taking action and permits things to take their natural course. Human nature is an unchangeable reality that always strongly influences human life. Deep down, people always have a soft spot for one who bears abuse quietly and refuses to be provoked, even in the face of the utmost provocation. The human conscience naturally tends to favour the oppressed rather than the oppressor. Great opportunities open out in the world of nature for those who are deprived of them in the world of men: when they stand firm in the face of persecution, they prove themselves to be in the right. The boycott imposed on the Prophet and his family in the seventh year of the prophetic mission was just such an example. As a result of this boycott, the Banu Hashim clan, except for Abu Lahab, were besieged in a mountain ravine called Shi'b Abi Talib. How these people quietly endured all this cruel oppression was bound to affect the conscience of others. And it did. Within three years, people like Abu'l-Bakhtari, Hisham ibn 'Amr, Zubayr ibn Umayyah, Zam'ah ibn al-Aswad and Mut'am ibn 'Adi broke away from the ranks of the enemy, openly challenging the propriety of the pact by which this boycott had been imposed on the Banu Hashim. The pact collapsed, and the Banu Hashim were rescued from their terrible plight.

The most important thing about patience is that it qualifies one for divine succour. Patient perseverance in pursuit of a worthy cause means putting one's affairs in the hands of the Lord of the Universe. It is inconceivable that those who trust in Almighty God for the sake of a just cause should find themselves forsaken.

There are various ways in which this divine succour manifests itself. But, unfortunately, the human mind can neither understand nor fathom them. Some of the forms which divine help takes, however, have been mentioned in the Quran. When Muslims confront non-Muslims in the field of battle, for instance, divine succour compensates for their insufficient resources: calmness and confidence enter the hearts of the believers, while fear weakens their opponents:

Believers, remember God's goodness to you when there came against your hosts. We unleashed against them a wind and soldiers you could not see. God saw all that you were doing.<sup>84</sup>

This verse deals with the Battle of the Trench (A.D. 627), when God sent two things—wind and an army of angels to support the believers. There is nothing extraordinary about wind. There is nowhere that it does not blow. But it was made to blow faster at a particular time and in a special place, thus assisting the believers. This shows that when God decides to help anyone, normal physical happenings assume a certain intensity, ensuring success.

As for the army of angels, they did not come and wield their swords alongside the Muslims. They provided psychological rather than military support. As on several other occasions, they did “give courage to the believers, and cast terror into the hearts of the infidels.”<sup>85</sup> They made the enemy appear as a “small band,” while the Muslims were made to appear as a “great army” in the eyes of their enemies.<sup>86</sup>

During the reign of the second Caliph, ‘Umar (A.D. 634-644), the Muslim army landed at Qadsiyyah, on the threshold of Iran, under the leadership of Saad ibn Abi Waqqas. They had to stay there longer than expected, and it was not long before their provisions ran out. Saad then sent a few men to look for cattle they could eat. They met an Iranian, whom they asked whether there were any goats or cows around. Although—the Iranian was a shepherd himself, he denied all knowledge of any animals in the vicinity. He had hidden his flock in a dense jungle nearby on hearing of the presence of the Muslim army. But then an ox called out: “The shepherd is lying. We are here, in this under-growth.” On hearing the cry, the Muslims entered the wood, seized a few beasts, and took them before Sa’d. When the rest of the army listened to the story, they were pleased and interpreted it as a sign that God’s succour was with them.

But, as the historian Ibn al-Taqtaqi has written, one should not be under the impression that the ox called out, “We are here,” in Arabic. Instead, it lowed as oxen usually do, and from its sound, the Muslims realized that cattle were hidden in the undergrowth.

Trusting In God

The Quran sums up the Islamic method in the following words:

And if they incline to peace, incline you to it, and put your trust in God. Indeed He is the Hearing, the Knowing. Should they seek to deceive you, God is All-sufficient for you.<sup>87</sup>

This shows that the proper Islamic method is to pursue our aims peacefully. Even when there is a fear that our opponents may deceive us, Muslims should still trust God and be ready to make peace.

This means that we should concentrate our efforts in that field of action where—without confrontation with others—there are opportunities for us to advance. As for other fields, those in which no opportunities present themselves—one should let the forces of nature go to work. If we reserve our efforts for those areas in which we can operate effectively, God will help us in others where we can do nothing. But, on the other hand, if we leave the arena of action allotted to us and seek to operate in some other where we have been afforded no opportunities, it is as if we have tried to function not from our arena but from God's. To try to usurp God in His work can only lead to His displeasure; it cannot earn us His succour.

THE PROPHET IN MAKKAH

There are two main periods of the Prophet Muhammad's life: the Makkan and the Madinan, derived from the towns of Makkah and Madinah. Place names tend to assume historical significance over and above their literal meaning, and Makkah and Madinah are no exceptions. They may initially have just names of places, but now they have become symbolic of the two faces of the Islamic coin—two aspects of the process by which Islam has come to the world. On the one hand, Makkah is symbolic of “dawah,” or calling people to the faith, while, on the other hand, Madinah is symbolic of revolution. One can put this another way and say that Makkah was where Islam's “dawah power” was first activated, while Madinah was where this power achieved supremacy. This verse of the Quran tells the whole story of both Makkan and Madinan Islam:

Muhammad is God's Messenger. Those with him are hard on the unbelievers but merciful to one another. You see them bow and prostrate themselves, seeking the grace of God and His goodwill. Their marks are on their faces, the traces of their prostrations. Thus they are described in the Torah and the Gospel: (they are) like the seed which puts forth its shoot and strengthens it, so that it rises stout and firm upon its stalk, delighting the sowers. Through them, God seeks to enrage the unbelievers. God has promised forgiveness and a rich reward for those who will believe and do good work.<sup>88</sup>

The reference to the Torah in this verse is made concerning the individual qualities of the companions of the Prophet. However, the reference to the Bible shows their qualities when they came together as a group. Their individual qualities developed in Makkah, whereas their qualities as a community emerged in Madinah.

Biographies of the Prophet usually treat their subject as if he were endowed with extraordinary magical powers, one who, by mysterious means, brought the whole of Arabia under his wing. These books read like fairy stories; even events with no miraculous content have been given a fanciful miraculous interpretation. Take the case of Suhayb ibn Sanan's migration from Makkah to Madinah. When some Quraysh youths blocked his path, Suhayb pleaded with them: "If I let you have all my property, will you let me go?" They said that they would. Suhayb had a few ounces of silver with him. He gave it all to them and carried on to Madinah. According to a tradition in Bayhaqi, Suhayb said that when the Prophet saw him in Madinah, he told Suhayb that his trading of handing over of his property to the Quraysh, had been very profitable. Suhayb, according to the tradition, was astounded, for no one had arrived in Madinah before him who could have brought the news. "It must have been Gabriel who told you," he said to the Prophet.

But the same event has been related by Ibn Marduyah, and Ibn Sa'd. According to them, Suhayb told his own story in these words:

I carried on until I reached Madinah. When the Prophet heard my handing over my property to the Quraysh, he said: "Suhayb has profited! Suhayb has profited!"<sup>89</sup>

The fact that the Prophet led such a simple life means that it is simple for others to follow his example. He was human like any other, but his life was a perfect pattern for others. According to al-Bukhari, he stumbled on the road like anyone else. Indeed, the reason his congregation refused to believe that he was the receiver of divine revelation was the very fact that, to all appearances, the Prophet appeared just like any normal human being:

You make transactions in the town. You seek a livelihood just as we do.<sup>90</sup>

The truth is that the greatness of the Prophet's life lies in its being a human event rather than a far-fetched tale of inimitable miraculous actions. The Prophet was God's humble and very human servant, and, having been chosen by God to spread His message, he was helped by Him at every critical hour. In this sense, his success was miraculous, but the Prophet was not endowed with miraculous powers.

Instead, the human aspect of his life emerges from a study of the Quran.

The Beginning of the Prophet's Public Mission

When, at forty, the Prophet Muhammad received his first revelation, he reacted as any normal human being would in such a situation. He was meditating in the Cave of Hira' at the time. Petrified, he returned home, where his wife Khadijah awaited him. Being an impartial judge, she was in a position to view the situation objectively. She could see that the Prophet's experience, far from being a bad dream, must have been a sign that God had chosen him. "It cannot be," she said, "God will surely never humiliate you. You are kind to your relatives; you always give the weak a helping hand; you help those out of work stand on their feet again; you honour guests. When people are in trouble, you assist them."<sup>91</sup>

The Prophet went about his task in a manner befitting one who was to preach a new message in a society attached to traditional beliefs and customs. He proceeded cautiously, following an entirely natural sequence. At first, he had to work in secret. This is how the historian Ibn Kathir describes an incident that occurred at the beginning of the Prophet's mission:

'Ali, son of Abu Talib and cousin of the Prophet, came into the Prophet's house while he and Khadijah were praying. He asked his cousin what they were about. The Prophet told him this was God's religion, the path that God had chosen. It was to call people to this path that He had sent His prophets to the world. "Belief in One God," the Prophet said. "He has no partner. Worship Him alone. Forsake the idols Lat and 'Uzza.' "I have heard nothing of this nature before today," 'Ali replied. "I cannot decide until I have discussed the matter with my father, Abu Talib." But the Prophet did not want anyone to know about his secret until the time had come for it to be made public. "'Ali," he said. "If you are not ready to become a Muslim, keep the matter to yourself" 'Ali waited for one night, and then God made his heart incline towards Islam. He went back to the Prophet early in the morning. "What was it that you were telling me yesterday?" He asked. Bear witness that there is none worthy of being served save God. He is One. He has no partner. Forsake Lat and 'Uzza, and disown all who are set up as equals with God." 'Ali did this and became a Muslim. Then, in fear of Abu Talib, he used to come and see the Prophet secretly. 'Ali kept his Islam a secret; he did not tell anyone about it."<sup>92</sup>

Even later, when the first Muslims among the tribes of Aws and Khazraj returned to Madinah, they followed the same policy. According to the historian Tabarani, "They returned to their people and invited them, secretly, to embrace Islam."

Throughout his entire public mission, the Prophet was cautious not to take any initiative until he was sure he possessed the necessary resources. ‘Aisha, wife of the Prophet and daughter of Abu Bakr, tells how, when the Prophet had gathered 38 followers around him, Abu Bakr urged him to publicize his mission. Abu Bakr thought the prophet and his companions should go out into the open and publicly preach Islam. But the Prophet told him: “No, Abu Bakr, we are too few.” The same thing happened in the sixth year of the Prophet’s mission, when ‘Umar accepted Islam. He protested to the Prophet: “Why should we keep our Islam a secret when we are right? And why should others be allowed to publicize their faith when they are in the wrong?” The Prophet gave ‘Umar the same reply that he had given Abu Bakr several years earlier: “We are too few, ‘Umar.” He continued this cautious posture as long as the Prophet remained in Makkah. After the emigration, with the consolidation of Muslim ranks, when the armed Quraysh advanced on Madinah to extirpate Islam and Muslims, permission was given to Muslims to counter the Quraysh. The first battle fought between the Muslims and their antagonists were the Battle of Badr. “Whoever is successful on this day,” the Prophet said as the battle began, “will be successful in times to come.” The meaning of the Prophet’s remark was that the time for Muslims to take positive initiatives was only when they could fashion a new future for Islam. If their actions were not likely to produce such results, it was better for them to be patient.

One thing is quite clear from biographies of the Prophet. When the task of public preaching devolved upon him, he became very conscious of the greatness of this task, realizing that it would require his complete and single-minded attention. Therefore, he hoped that his family would look after him financially so that he could concentrate on his preaching work, freed from having to look for a livelihood. So he called 'Abd al-Muttalib's family together in his own house. There were about thirty family members at that time. The Prophet told them what his true mission in life now was. He asked for their support so that he would be free to discharge his prophetic duties. This is how Imam Ahmad describes the incident, on the authority of 'Aisha:

“Banu Muttalib,” the Prophet said, “I have been sent to you in particular and to humanity in general. Who will swear allegiance to me and become my brother and companion? Who will fulfil my debts and my promises on my behalf? Who will look after my family affairs for me? He will be with me in heaven.” Someone spoke up: “Muhammad, you are an ocean. Who can come forward and accept such responsibility?”<sup>93</sup>

The Prophet's own family were not ready to accept responsibility for him. 'Abbas ibn 'Abd al-Muttalib, the Prophet's uncle, was financially able to look after his nephew. Yet he remained silent for fear that this responsibility would devour his wealth. God, however, helped His Prophet, first through the Prophet's wife, Khadijah bint Khuwaylid, and later through Abu Bakr, whose wealth saw the Prophet through the years in Madinah.

The Prophet displayed boyish enthusiasm to communicate the faith to others. On the authority of 'Abdullah ibn al-'Abbas, the historian Ibn Jarir tells how the Quraysh nobles gathered around the Ka'bah one day and called for the Prophet. He came quickly, thinking that they might be feeling some leanings towards Islam. He was always eager that his people should accept the guidance of Islam. The thought of their being doomed was a great distress to him. It transpired, however, that they had just wanted to pick a quarrel. Acceptance of Islam was the last thing on their minds. The Prophet talked to them at length, then went away in distress. Ibn Hisham takes up the story:

The Prophet returned to his home sad and disillusioned, for his hopes for his people when they called him had been dashed. He had seen how far people were from accepting his message.<sup>94</sup>

When the Prophet's uncle, Abu Talib, lay dying, people came to him and asked him to settle matters between his nephew and themselves before he died. "Take an undertaking from him on our behalf, and one from us on his behalf, so that he should have nothing to do with us, nor us with him," they said. Abu Talib called his nephew and asked him what he wanted of the people. The Prophet replied that he just wanted them to testify that there was none worthy of being served to save God and forsake all other objects of worship. His people, however, were unwilling to accept this. When everyone left, Abu Talib told his nephew: "You know, I don't think it was tough that you asked of them." Hearing his uncle's words, the Prophet's hopes soared; for now, perhaps he would accept Islam. "Uncle," he said, "then why don't you testify to the oneness of God so that I may intercede for you on the Day of Judgement?"<sup>95</sup> The Prophet was sorely disappointed that his uncle never accepted Islam.

The dedication with which the Prophet applied himself to his task was total, all his mental and physical energy being channelled into it. Not only his time but also his property went into the furtherance of the Islamic cause. Before the start of his mission, the Prophet had become quite rich through his marriage to the wealthy Khadijah. At the beginning of the Makkan period, the Quraysh sent 'Utbah ibn Rabi'ah to talk to the Prophet. As Ibn Kathir explains, he soon found himself being won over; (an event which his relatives, unfortunately, misinterpreted as being due to the love of the Prophet's wealth):

Afterwards 'Utbah stayed home and did not go out to see anybody. "Fellow Quraysh," Abu Jahl said, "It seems to me that 'Utbah has become attracted towards Muhammad. He must have been taken by the food that Muhammad offered him. This can only be due to some need of his. Let's go and see him." So off they went. "Utbah," Abu Jahl said, "we have come to see you because we are sure that you have taken a liking to Muhammad and his religion. Look, if you want, we can accumulate enough money to ensure you will not have to go to him to be fed." "Utbah became angry and swore he would never speak to Muhammad again!"<sup>96</sup>

Similarly, Walid ibn Mughirah once came to see the Prophet. When the latter recited some verses of the Quran to him, Walid was very impressed by the style of the Book of God. When Abu Jahl heard about this, he went to see Walid and told him that people would make a collection for him because he needed some money and had gone to Muhammad for this purpose. The Prophet, then, was financially very well placed when he commenced his mission. But when, after 13 years, he emigrated to Madinah, it was a very different story. He had nothing left and had to borrow some money from Abu Bakr for the Journey.

The Prophet's Call

Looked at from a logical point of view, the Islamic call consists of certain constant, recurrent factors. It is the same points—the oneness of God, the importance and inevitability of life after death, and the need for people to understand their position as God's servants and live according to the prophetic pattern—which is stressed again and again. When these points come from the tongue of the preacher of God's word, however, they take on the hue of the preacher's person; he adds an element of individuality to unvarying themes. This addition means that the message of Islam, far from being a repetition of set texts, is expressed with irresistible vitality and spontaneity. One in meaning, it becomes diverse in the forms it takes. Fixed though its topics are, compiling a complete list of them becomes impossible. The heart of the preacher of God's word is full of fear of God; it is his ardent desire to bring his audience onto the path of proper guidance. He knows that if he can get God's servants close to God, God will be pleased with him. These factors spur him on in his task. They ensure that his words, far from being repetitive and monotonous, have an inspired air about them. Despite being one in theme, his message becomes varied in tone. The preacher of God's word thinks first and foremost of his congregation. More than anything, he wants them to find the right guidance. This means that he makes allowances for the needs of every individual he addresses and casts his words in a mould that will be understandable to them.

No one followed this pattern more completely than the Prophet of Islam. Night and day, he was busy preaching the word of God. But his preaching was far from a bland repetition of certain set speeches. Instead, he used to consider the nature of his congregation in formulating his message.

On one occasion, in the early days of Makkah, the Prophet preached Islam to Abu Sufyan and his wife, Hind. This is how he framed his address:

Abu Sufyan ibn Barb, Hind bint ‘Utbah. You are going to die; then you will be raised. The good will then be admitted into heaven, and the wicked will enter hell. I am telling you the truth.<sup>97</sup>

The historian Ibn Khuzaymah recorded the following conversation between a member of the Makkan nobility, Husain, and the Prophet Muhammad “Tell me, Husain,” the Prophet said, “how many gods do you worship?” “Seven on earth and one in heaven,” Husain replied. “Whom do you call on when you are in trouble?” the Prophet asked. “The one in heaven,” Husain answered. “And whom do you call on when you have suffered the loss of wealth?” the Prophet asked again. “The one in heaven came the same reply. “He alone answers your prayers,” the Prophet said, “Then why do you set up others as His equals?”<sup>98</sup>

Imam Ahmad has reported, on the authority of Abu Umamah, that a man from a particular tribe came to the Prophet and asked him what teachings he had brought from God. “That relationships should be strengthened, and wrongful killing avoided. Roads should be left open. Idols should be broken. Only one God should be served; no others should be set up with Him as His equals,” the Prophet replied.

After he had reached Madinah, however, when he sent a formal invitation to the people of Najran, he presented his message differently:

I call you to serve God rather than men and to acknowledge the sovereign power of God rather than that of men.<sup>99</sup>

The Quran provided a constant and essential basis for the Prophet's preaching. Whenever the Prophet met anybody, he would recite a passage of the Quran to him. Often phrases like, "He made mention of Islam, and read some of the Quran to them," or "He presented the message of Islam before them, and recited to them a passage of the Quran," recurred in traditions concerning the Prophet's preaching mission. The Quran possessed extraordinary magnetism for the Arabs. Even some of the direst enemies of Islam used to steal up to the Prophet's house at night, put their ears to the wall, and listen to him reciting the Quran. The sublime style of the Quran used to have the most profound impact on the Prophet's people. Take the case of Walid ibn Mughirah who once came to the Prophet on behalf of the Quraysh. When the Prophet read him a passage of the Quran, Walid was so impressed that he returned to the Quraysh and told them that the Quran was a literary work of such unsurpassable excellence that it overshadowed everything else. In those days, reciting the Quran was a standard method of preaching Islam. When Mus'ab ibn Zubayr was sent to Madinah as a preacher, he "talked to people and recited a passage of the Quran to them." That was why people came to know him as "al-Muqri", the reciter of the Quran.

During his time in Makkah, the Prophet's preaching was always conducted on an advanced intellectual level. It was dominated by the lofty literary standard set by the Quran. On the other hand, the Prophet's opponents could offer only abuse and opprobrium in reply. Sensible people in Makkah could not help but conclude that Muhammad's opponents had nothing concrete to offer to support their case. According to Ibn Jarir, some of the nobles of the Quraysh planned to call a meeting and talk to the Prophet. They intended "to place themselves above reproach as far as he was concerned" to assure him they had nothing to do with the base tactics followed by the Prophet's direst enemies.

The Aptitude of the Arabs

Now we come to the factors that produce the reaction that Islamic preaching evokes. However untiring the efforts of the preacher, and no matter how accurately he presents the true message of Islam, it is more the disposition of his audience that determines whether his call is accepted. The character of the Arabs was a valuable factor contributing to their acceptance of Islam. They were human beings brought up in simple, natural surroundings. Despite their superficial ignorance and stubbornness, they retained the qualities of their environment. Thirty million square kilometres of desert, the hot, bare, rugged country in which they lived, was an ideal breeding ground for the loftiest human values. An average Arab had just one source of income—his camel. But if he had guests, he would sacrifice this invaluable beast to provide them with food. If a victim of oppression took refuge with an Arab in his tent, he knew he had a friend who would give his own life to defend the wronged. Even plunderers did their looting in a chivalrous manner. If they wanted to snatch the clothes and jewellery of a tribe's womenfolk, they would not allow themselves to grab them off the women's bodies with their own hands: instead, they would tell the women to hand over their valuables, and they would look in the opposite direction so that they did not catch sight of them while they were taking off their clothes.

It would be misleading to think of the desert Arabs as pure simpletons who knew nothing. On the contrary, they were brilliant, alert people, quick to penetrate a matter's depths.

Seven Muslim converts came to the Prophet from a particular tribe. They told him that they had learnt five things during the ignorance that preceded Islam. They would adhere to these principles unless the Prophet gave them other instructions. The Prophet then asked them what characteristics they had inherited from ignorance. "Thankfulness in times of affluence," they answered, "and patience in times of difficulty. Steadfastness on the field of battle and resignation to fate. We learnt not to rejoice over another's setbacks, even if one's enemy was afflicted."

“These people are intellectuals, men of letters,” the Prophet said when he heard this. “They are cast in the mould of prophets. How wonderful their words.”<sup>100</sup>

Damad, a practising exorcist belonging to the tribe of Banu Azdashanuah, once came to Makkah. People there told him about the Prophet. “An evil spirit possesses him,” they said. So Damad went to see the Prophet, thinking that he might be able to cure him. But when he heard the Prophet’s words, his attitude changed. “I have heard soothsayers and conjurors,” he said. “I have seen the works of poets. But I have never come across anything of this nature. Give me your hand,” he said to the Prophet. “Let me swear allegiance to you.” As was his custom, the Prophet did not give a long talk on this occasion. This was all he said:

Praise be to God. We praise Him and seek help from Him. One whom God guides, no one can send astray, and one whom God sends astray, no one can guide. I bear witness that none is worthy of being served to save God. He has no equal.<sup>101</sup>

In these few words, Damad found a wealth of meaning. “Say that again,” he requested the Prophet. “Your words are as deep as the ocean.”<sup>102</sup>

For an Arab, there was no discrepancy between words and deeds. He was true to his word and expected others to be the same. He accepted the truth of a matter as soon as he comprehended it. According to the Prophet’s biographer, Ibn Ishaq, the Banu Sa'd tribe sent Damam ibn Tha'labah to the Prophet on their behalf. He arrived in Madinah, sat his camel near the mosque gate, and tied it up. Then he went inside. The Prophet was sitting there with his companions. Damam was a brave and intelligent man. He stood before the gathering and asked: "Who among you is the son of 'Abdul Muttalib?" "I am," the Prophet replied. "Muhammad," Damam said, "I will ask you a few questions and be quite severe in my questioning. I hope you won't mind." "Not at all," the Prophet replied. "You can ask what you like." "Will you swear to me by the name of your God and the God of those before you, and the God of those who will come after you, that God has sent you as His Prophet?" "By God, yes," the Prophet replied. "Will you swear to me," Damam continued, "by the name of your God, and the God of those before you, and the God of those who will come after you, that God has told you to exhort us to worship Him alone and ascribe no partners to Him; that He has commanded you to tell us to forsake idol worship, and all the things that our forefathers used to worship?" "By God, yes," the Prophet replied. "I ask you to swear to me," Damam said once again, "by the name of your God and the God of those before you, and the God of those who will come after you that has God commanded that we should pray five times a day." Damam then asked about zakat (alms), fasting, Hajj (pilgrimage) and all the other injunctions of Islam, framing each question similarly.

When he had finished his questioning, and the Prophet had given him the same simple answer to every question, Damam spoke these words:

I bear witness that there is none worthy of being served save God, and Muhammad is the Prophet of God. I shall discharge these obligations and avoid the things you have prohibited. I shall do no more and no less.<sup>103</sup>

He then mounted his camel and rode away. When he reached his people, he told them what had happened. Before the day was out, all the men and women awaiting his homecoming had accepted Islam.

There was not a trace of hypocrisy in these people. They knew only acceptance or denial—nothing in between. When they made a promise, they fulfilled it, come what may. No threat of loss of life or property could prevent them from converting their words into actions. Such was the nature of the Arab temperament. Historians have described the speeches of the Aws and the Khazraj—the two tribes of Madinah—on the occasion of the Second Oath of Allegiance. They have all the lustre which distinguished their race. ‘Abbas ibn ‘Ubaydah said: “People of Khazraj, do you know what you are committing yourselves to, swearing allegiance to this man? You are committing yourselves to war with men of all races. Think about this. If, when you incur a loss of life and property, you will send him back to his people, then it is better that you do so now. If you do so later, it will mean humiliation for you in this world and the next. But if you think you can keep your promises, how much loss you incur, and how many of your leaders are killed, take him to Madinah. This will be better for you in this world and the next.”

Everyone said in unison that they would take the Prophet with them, no matter what loss of life and property they incurred. “What will we have in return if we keep our word?” They asked the Prophet. “Paradise,” he replied. “Hold out your hand to us,” they cried out. He extended his hand and accepted their allegiance.<sup>104</sup>

These were not mere words on the part of the Ansar; they were words borne out by actions. Even when the Muslims became dominant, they demanded no political compensation for their sacrifices. On the contrary, they were quite willing to let the Caliphate remain in the hands of the Makkans. They did not seek reward in this world but were content to leave this world to others and to look forward to their reward in the next world from God.

The Pervasiveness of the Prophet’s Message

The Prophet’s biographer, Ibn Ishaq, tells how the Quraysh nobility once gathered at the house of Abu Talib, the Prophet’s uncle. Among those present were ‘Utbah ibn Rabi’ah, Shaybah ibn Rabi’ah, Abu Jahl ibn Hisham, Umayyah ibn Khalaf and Abu Sufyan ibn Harb, all outstanding leaders of the Quraysh. Through Abu Talib, they asked the Prophet what he wanted from them. "Just one thing," the Prophet replied. "If you accept it, you will become lords over the Arabs. Even the non-Arabs will capitulate to you."<sup>105</sup>

Monotheism is more than just a doctrine. It is the secret of all forms of human success. To believe in one God is to give true expression to human nature. That is why this faith lodges itself in the depths of the human psyche. It even finds a place in the hearts of one's enemies. Khalid ibn al-Walid became a Muslim just before the conquest of Makkah, but he had been conscious for quite sometime before that of the truth of the message of Islam. Later, he told of his early conviction that Muhammad, not the Quraysh, was in the right and that he should join forces with the Prophet of Islam. "I participated in every battle against Muhammad," he said. "But there was not one battle from which I did not go away with the feeling that I was fighting on the wrong side."<sup>106</sup>

Many people are reported to have had inclinations towards Islam long before they accepted the faith. Some even had dreams about Islam. One such person was Khalid ibn Sa'id ibn al-'As. Finally, he saw himself in a dream standing on the edge of an enormous fire pit. Someone was trying to push him in. Then the Prophet Muhammad came and rescued him from the pit of doom.

Difficult though it may be to see the economic connection in missionary work, there is an indirect link of the utmost significance. When a person becomes Muslim, all his resources are automatically put at the disposal of the Islamic cause. First, Khadijah, the Prophet's wife, provided the Islamic movement financial assistance. Then Abu Bakr, who had accumulated 40,000 dirhams from his trading, put all his capital into the service of Islam. When he and the Prophet emigrated from Makkah to Madinah, he took 6000 dirhams with him—enough to finance the entire expenses of the journey. 'Uthman donated 10,000 dinars towards the expedition to Tabuk in A.H. 9. On one occasion alone, 'Abd al-Rahman ibn 'Awf gave 500 horses, to be used in the service of the Islamic cause. So it was with others who accepted Islam. Just as they entered the Islamic fold, their properties became part of the Islamic treasury.

Belief in one God is the only creed which does not allow for any social distinction or racial prejudice. For this reason, the masses flock to join any movement which rises based on this creed. They realize that under the banner of monotheism, all people become equal in the real sense. As humble servants of one great God, they all become actual human beings with a right to human dignity. By finding their proper place in the world, they achieve the most significant position that man can aspire to. When Mughirah ibn Shu'bah entered the court of the Iranian warrior Rustam, he made a speech to the courtiers gathered there. As Ibn Jarir explains, his words had a devastating effect on all who heard them:

The lower classes said: "By God, this Arabian has spoken the truth." As for the upper classes: they said, "By God, he has attacked us with words which our slaves will find irresistible. God damn, our predecessors. How stupid they were to think lightly of this community."<sup>107</sup>

When he and Abu Bakr arrived in Madinah in the thirteenth year of the Prophet's mission, about 500 people came to meet him. They greeted the newcomers with these words:

Welcome! You are both safe with us. We accept you as our leaders.<sup>108</sup>

The Prophet's preaching alone had made him the leader of the people of Madinah. The first inhabitant of Madinah to whom the Prophet had preached Islam was probably Suwayd ibn Samit al-Khazraji. When the Prophet had given him an outline of the teachings of Islam, Suwayd said: "It seems that your message is the same as mine." "What's your message?" the Prophet asked. "The wisdom of Luqman," Suwayd replied. When the Prophet asked him to explain the wisdom of Luqman, Suwayd recited a few poems. "I have the Quran," the Prophet said, "which is far superior to this." He then recited a few verses of the Quran, and Suwayd immediately accepted Islam. He went back to Madinah and preached the message of Islam to his tribe, but they killed him.<sup>109</sup>

After this, a chieftain of Madinah, Abu'l Haysar Anas ibn Rafi', came to Makkah. With him was a group of youths of the Banu 'Abd al-Ashhal tribe. They had come to Makkah to make an alliance with the Quraysh on behalf of the Khazraj, one of the main tribes of Madinah, who were embroiled in a conflict with the other main tribe, the Aws. The Prophet heard that they were in Makkah. He went to see them and said: "Shall I tell you about something even better than what you have come for?" He then explained to them the meaning of belief in One God. A youth among them called Ayas ibn Mu'adh told his people that what the Prophet had told them was much better than what they had come for. The delegation, however, did not agree. "Leave us alone," they said, "We are here on other business." They returned to Madinah. Soon afterwards, the vicious and devastating battle took place between the Aws and Khazraj known as Bu'ath.

According to Khubayb ibn 'Abd al-Rahman, two people from Madinah, Sa'd ibn Zararah, and Zakwan ibn Qays came to Makkah and stayed with 'Utbah ibn Rabi'ah. When they heard about the Prophet, they went to see him. The Prophet called on them both to accept Islam and recited a passage from the Quran. They accepted the Prophet's invitation and became Muslim. Rather than return to their host's house, 'Utbah, they returned to Madinah after seeing the Prophet. They were the first to communicate the message of Islam to the people of Madinah. This was in the tenth year of the Prophet's mission, three years before the emigration to Madinah.

The following year, six people from the Khazraj tribe came to Makkah for Hajj. They became Muslim, swore allegiance to the Prophet, and then returned to Madinah to propagate Islam there. Then, twelve people came to swear allegiance to the Prophet in the twelfth year of the Prophet's mission. Their oath at 'Aqabah near Makkah is famous in Islamic history as the First Oath of 'Aqabah. In the same place, another pact followed the next year, in which 75 people participated.

Contrary to what happened in Makkah, the outstanding personalities of the city of Madinah accepted Islam at the very outset. According to tribal customs, people in those days followed their leaders' religion. Islam, then, spread quickly in Madinah. Soon there was not a single home into which Islam had not entered. So it was natural that, as the Muslims achieved a majority in Madinah, they should become the dominant force in the city's affairs. And so it was that, as Tabarini has reported, "the Muslims were the most influential people in the city."

Factors Working in Favour of Preaching Work

Some resist the corruption of their world and remain attached to their own true, primordial natures. This is true of every day and age, but it was especially true of the Arabs when the Prophet commenced his mission. Besides the simple way of life to which they were accustomed, there was the legacy of the religion of Abraham, which made many inclined to seek out the truth and turn away from idol worship. Such people were commonly known as hanif or upright. Quss ibn Sa'idah and Waraqah ibn Nawfal were among these hunafa'. So was Jandub ibn 'Amr al-Dawsi. During the period of ignorance that preceded Islam, he was known to have said:

I know that there must be a Creator of all this creation, but I do not know whom He is.<sup>110</sup>

When he heard about the Prophet, he came with 75 of his fellow tribespeople and accepted Islam. Abu Dharr al Ghifari was another such person. As soon as he heard about the prophet, he sent his brother to Makkah to learn more about him. One sentence of the account that Abu Dharr's brother later gave him ran as follows:

I saw a man whom people call irreligious. I have never seen anyone who resembles you more than him.<sup>111</sup>

People like these had no trouble understanding the truth of the Prophet's message.

The preacher of God's word is like a planter who goes out to sow seeds. If sometimes his seeds fall on barren rounds, other times they fall in places that produce a good yield without the planter even knowing it.

Certain people took a considerable time to accept Islam. This does not mean that the truth of Islam finally dawned on them all of a sudden. The Prophet lived a life of the highest moral calibre. Moreover, he spent his whole time preaching the word of God. Even the opposition to the Prophet proved to be a factor in his favour: it meant that his personality and message were conversation topics. All these things contributed to planting the seed of Islam in the minds of many Arabs. Adherence to tribal tradition and ancestor worship was still extant, and this sometimes made it appear that there was stiff opposition to Islam, but all the while, in people's hearts, the seed of Islam was silently growing. It is generally thought that 'Umar's acceptance of Islam, for instance, came suddenly, under the influence of a particular event. It would be more accurate to say that this event put the final seal on his faith, which had been developing for some time within his soul.

Well before 'Umar had accepted Islam, when he appeared to be at the forefront of the opposition to the Prophet's mission, some Muslims emigrated to Abyssinia. Umm 'Abdullah bint Abi Hathmah was one of them. She tells her own story in these words:

We were setting off for Abyssinia. My husband, 'Amir, had collected some of his belongings. Suddenly, 'Umar ibn al-Khattab, a man who had subjected us to untold suffering and torment, came and stood beside me. Until then, he had not accepted Islam. "Umm 'Abdullah," he said to me, "are you going away somewhere?" "We are," I replied, "for you, people inflict such suffering upon us, and torment us so, that we must go and seek a place for ourselves in God's land. We will keep going until God releases us from our affliction." "May God go with you," 'Umar said, tears running down his face as he talked. I had never seen him act like this before. Then he went on his way and was sad to see us leave Makkah.<sup>112</sup>

In every day and age, some ideas take root in the popular psyche. Before these ideas are banished, no new message, however rational, can become acceptable. The opposition, which the Arabs first presented to the message of Islam, was not just the result of stubbornness or expediency on their part. Instead, it was genuinely difficult for them to understand how any religion which differed from that of the patrons of the Holy Ka'bah could be the true religion. Arab tribes living in the vicinity of Jewish areas were generally free of such restrictive creeds. They had often heard from the Jews that it was written in their scriptures that a Prophet would come among the Arabs. As the historian Tabarani explains, that was why it was easier for the people of Madinah to see the truth of Islam:

When the Ansar heard the teachings of the Prophet, they remained silent. Their hearts were satisfied that what he preached was true. They had heard from the People of the Book what the Final Prophet would be like. They recognized the truth of his message. They confirmed his teachings and believed in him.<sup>113</sup>

When the Prophet went to the fair of 'Ukaz and, entering the tent of the Banu Kandah, explained his teachings, this is what one youth had to say in reply:

My people, let us hurry and be the first to follow this man, for by God, the People of the Book used to tell us that a Prophet would arise from the Sacred Territory and that his time has drawn nigh.<sup>114</sup>

The Aws and Khazraj had become intellectually prepared for the coming of an Arab Prophet. Therefore, it was comparatively easy for them to accept him when he came. As far as the people of Makkah were concerned, however, and most of their compatriots, the truth could only be seen regarding who controlled the Ka'bah. In ancient Arab tradition, the Ka'bah was considered a king's crown. However, its symbolism was of a higher order than a crown, for the latter brings with it only political power, whereas one who held sway over the Ka'bah was heir to a wealth of spiritual tradition. Therefore, as the following conversation between Dhu'l Jawshan al-Dubba'i and the Prophet shows, Arabs, in their simplicity, could think of truth only in terms of who was in control of the House of God, the Kaaba in Makkah:

"Why don't you accept Islam," the Prophet said to Dhu'l Jawshan, "so that you may be counted among the first to have done so?" Dhu'l Jawshan said that he would not. The Prophet asked why. "I have heard that your people are after your blood," Dhu'l Jawshan said. "Have you not heard about their defeat at Badr?" the Prophet asked. Dhu'l Jawshan said that he had. "We are only showing you the path of guidance," the Prophet said. Dhu'l Jawshan said that he would not accept Islam until he (the Prophet) had conquered Makkah and won control of the Ka'bah. "If you live, you will see this happen," the Prophet said. Dhu'l Jawshan says that later he was with his family in Ghawr when a rider appeared. Dhu'l Jawshan asked him what was afoot. "Muhammad has conquered Makkah and taken control of the Sacred Territory," he said. "Woe betides me," Dhu'l Jawshan said. "If only I had accepted Islam on that day: if I had asked Muhammad for an emerald, he would have given it to me."<sup>115</sup>

Reaction to the Message of Islam

When the Prophet of Islam commenced his preaching mission, he met with exactly the reaction one would expect from a society hearing a new message. People were at a loss to grasp the meaning of his teachings. Once, the Quraysh nobility sent 'Utbah ibn Rabi'ah as their representative to the Prophet. He made a long denunciation of the Prophet and his teachings. When he had had his say, the Prophet asked him: "Have you finished?"

'Utbah said that he had. "In the Name of God, the Beneficent, the Merciful," the Prophet began, and then went on to recite the first thirteen verses of the chapter of the Quran entitled Ha Mim al Sajdah. "Don't you have anything else to say?" 'Utbah asked indignantly. The Prophet said that he did not. When he returned to the Quraysh, they asked him what had happened, "I said whatever you would have wanted me to say,” replied ‘Utbah. They asked whether Muhammad had given any answer. ‘Utbah said that he had but that the proofs he offered were incomprehensible. All that he had gathered was that he was warning them of a thunderbolt like that which had overtaken Thamud and Ad. “What has become of you?” the Quraysh asked. “How is it that a person speaks to you in Arabic, and you do not understand what he says?” “I didn’t understand anything,” ‘Utbah insisted. “All I gathered was that he mentioned a thunderbolt.”<sup>116</sup>

Some people were only familiar with religion in a particular, conventional form. To them, the message of Islam just appeared to be an indictment of their elders. Damad once came to Makkah to perform ‘Umrah. He had occasion to sit in a gathering with Abu Jahl, ‘Utbah ibn Rabi’ah and Umayyah ibn Khalaf. “He (Muhammad) has caused a split in our community,” Abu Jahl declared. “He thinks we are all fools and considers our ancestors woefully astray. He insults our idols.” “He is insane, without a doubt,” Umayyah added.<sup>117</sup>

When ‘Amr ibn Murrah al-Juhani preached Islam among his tribe, the Juhaynah, one of them spoke up: “May God make you taste the bitterness of life, ‘Amr. Do you want us to forsake our idols, disunite our people, and contradict the religion of our righteous ancestors? The religion that this Quraysh from Tahamah preaches has no affection or graciousness.”

He then went on to recite three verses, the last of which went like this:

He seeks to prove that our forefathers were fools.

One who acts thus can never prosper.<sup>118</sup>

Some people were prevented by jealousy from accepting the message of Islam. The Prophet made no secret of the fact that God sent him; he proclaimed the truth to all and sundry. But people always find it very difficult to accept that someone else has been given a knowledge of reality that they have been denied. Bayhaqi has related, on the authority of Mughirah ibn Shu’bah, how Abu Jahl once took the Prophet aside and said to him, “By God, I know full well what you say is true, but one thing stops me from believing. The Banu Qusayy say that they are the gatekeepers of the Ka’bah, and I agree with them. They say that it is their job to bear water for pilgrims, and again I agree. They claim a place in the Dar al-Nadwah, and I agree they have every right to it. They say it is their responsibility to carry the standard in battle, and again I agree. Now they say that there is a Prophet among them. This I cannot accept.”<sup>119</sup>

For some people, the threat of financial loss prevented them from accepting the message of Islam. The House of God at Makkah had been turned into a house of idol worship before the coming of the Prophet. People of every religion had placed their idols there. There were even statues of Jesus and Mary within the walls of the Kaaba, which had thus become a place of pilgrimage for people of all denominations. This was why four months had been made sacred—so people would be free to visit the Kaaba during that time without fear of being harmed or attacked. During the four months people used to flock to Makkah, Makkan traders did excellent business. Were the idols to be removed from the Kaaba, people would stop visiting the city, and its inhabitants would suffer immense losses. So there were many people with a vested interest in the continuance of polytheistic practices. They feared that if monotheism were to spread in the land, Makkah would suffer drastically; the area would be reduced to the uncultivable valley that it was.

Additionally, due to their position as patrons of the Ka'bah, the Quraysh had come to lord over tribes far and wide. Their caravans used to travel east and west, far beyond the boundaries of the peninsula. Following long-standing pacts, they used to do business with tribes as far afield as Persia, Abyssinia and the Byzantine Empire. Therefore, the Quraysh thought accepting Muhammad as a prophet could only result in neighbouring tribes—in fact, all the polytheists of Arabia—breaking off the commercial agreements they had made with the Quraysh. That would also be the end of their hegemony over the Arabs. This is the meaning of the verse in the surah of the Quran entitled al-Waqi'ah (The Event): "And have you made denial your means of livelihood."<sup>120</sup> The allusion is to the Quraysh's notion that they were saving themselves from financial ruin by denying the Prophet Muhammad and the monotheistic religion he taught.

Once the Prophet started to preach his message, his person became the subject of general curiosity. According to the historian Abu Ya'la, people who saw him used to ask one another: "Is this him?" He might be travelling amidst a host in a caravan, but people would single him out for mention. Anyone who came to Makkah would, among other things, take back news of the Prophet. "Muhammad, the son of Abdullah, has laid claim to prophethood, and the son of Abu Qahafah has followed him," they would say. The Quraysh used to call the Prophet "muzammam," meaning blameworthy, instead of Muhammad, meaning praiseworthy. They used to accuse him of insulting their ancestors. Once, as the Prophet's biographer, Ibn Hisham, had once related, when the Prophet noticed the litter his fellow Quraysh had put in the street on which he was passing, he said in dismay: "What bad neighbours the Banu 'Abd al-Manaf are."<sup>121</sup>

While the Prophet's uncle, Abu Talib, was alive, his enemies could not take any action against him, for, according to tribal custom, aggression against the Prophet would have amounted to aggression against his whole tribe—the Banu Hashim. Before he accepted Islam, 'Umar ibn al-Khattab once set off to kill Muhammad. It was only sufficient for Umar to change his mind when someone said to him, “How are you going to live with the Banu Hashim if you kill Muhammad?” The same question faced anyone who sought to harm the Prophet. Persecution in Makkah was mostly directed against enslaved people who had become Muslim—people with no tribe to protect them. According to the Prophet’s close companion, ‘Abdullah ibn Mas’ud, in the early days of Makkah, only seven men came out into the open about being Muslim: the Prophet himself, Abu Bakr, ‘Ammar, Sa’id, Suhayb, Bilal and Miqdad. “As for the Prophet, God protected him through his uncle. As for Abu Bakr, his tribe looked after him. The polytheists would seize the rest, putting coats of armour on them and laying them out in the boiling sun.”<sup>122</sup>

When the chief of the Banu Hashim, the Prophet’s uncle, Abu Talib, died, an uncouth member of the Quraysh threw dirt at the Prophet, and it stuck to him. When the latter reached home, one of his daughters, Fatimah, brushed the dirt off him. “The Quraysh did nothing nasty to me like this before,” the Prophet commented. It was only after the death of Abu Talib that they committed mean acts of aggression of this nature. As the Prophet’s companion, Abu Hurayrah, has pointed out, “the Quraysh used to treat the Prophet very harshly after the death of his uncle.” “Uncle, how quickly I have felt your loss,” the Prophet lamented.<sup>123</sup> The Quraysh even started planning to do away with the Prophet. During this period, Abu Jahl threw an animal’s intestines onto the Prophet's head, and 'Uqbah ibn Mu'it tied a sheet around his neck and pulled it tight to strangulate him. Fortunately, it was unsuccessful. However, now that Abu Talib was dead, nothing seemed to stop vicious attacks on the Prophet's person.

The only thing that held people back was that nothing of this nature had happened before in Arabia; for a member of the Banu Hashim to be attacked and killed by his own fellow Quraysh would have been an action without precedent. Additionally, there were still people among the idolaters whose consciences pricked them, who supported the Prophet in their hearts. The first time Abu Jahl made a murderous attack upon the Prophet, Abu'l Bakhtari heard about it. He took a whip and went to the Ka'bah, where Abu Jahl sat triumphantly with his associates. Abu'l Bakhtari first made sure that Abu Jahl had attacked the Prophet in this way, and when it turned out that he had, he took his whip and struck Abu Jahl so hard on the head that the latter roared with pain.

One can see from the history of various religions how, even as a creed, polytheism has always been super-sensitive to criticism. But in ancient times, polytheism was more than just a creed; it provided the very foundation of the structure of social orders. There were political reasons, too, for the people's fanatical attachment to polytheism. This was the situation in Makkah, and for this reason, the Prophet's time there was such a supreme test of patience. Only a handful of people believed in him during the first three years of his mission. The town of Makkah was as devoid of supporters who would help the Prophet as it was of shade-giving trees. Only four people remained close to him—‘Ali, Zayd, Abu Bakr and Khadijah—five if one includes the first person born a Muslim, ‘Aisha, the daughter of Abu Bakr.

So the situation remained for three full years. When the Prophet left his house, he was greeted with derisive jeers in the street as if he were a madman. One day—at the instigation of Abu Jahl—a group of people were abusing the Prophet. A passer-by was unable to put up with the sight of a person from a noble Quraysh family being treated in this manner. He went straight to the Prophet’s uncle, Hamzah. “Have you lost all sense of honour?” he said. “You are sitting back while people are disgracing your nephew.” This was enough to ignite Hamzah’s sense of Arab pride. He had an iron bow, which he took with him and went to see Abu Jahl. Striking the Prophet’s oppressor, he said: “I have adopted Muhammad’s religion as my own. If you have it in you, do something about it.”<sup>124</sup>

Hamzah was famed as a fighter all over Arabia. After he took this action, people gained new courage, and the number of Muslims increased to thirty. At this time, there were two highly influential people in Makkah— ‘Umar ibn al-Khattab and Abu Jahl ibn Hisham. The Prophet prayed to God: “Lord, strengthen Islam through ‘Umar ibn al-

Khattab or Abu Jahl ibn Hisham.” This prayer was accepted in the former’s case. In the sixth year of the Prophet’s mission, ‘Umar ibn al-Khattab accepted Islam.

Along with him, several other people converted, and the number of Muslims increased to forty. During this period, the Muslims had a hideout in Dar al-Arqam. According to the historian Ibn Kathir, thirty-nine people used to gather there.

But such a small number could not combat the might of the conventional system, which in numbers and resources was far stronger. It was not long before the oppression of the Muslims started again. The Prophet was subjected to every form of persecution, but all attempts to kill him failed. The tribal system was still protective of the Prophet. No one could dare to take his life, for to do so would have been to declare war on the whole of the Prophet’s tribe. He was not the only prophet to be defended in this way. The Prophet Shu’ayb’s people also refrained from killing him for the same reason, despite their desire to do so:

They said: “O Shu’ayb, we do not understand much of what you say to us. And we see you weak among us. But for your tribe, we would have stoned you. You are not dear to us.”<sup>125</sup>

The Quraysh once presented a demand to the chief of the Banu Hashim, the Prophet’s uncle, Abu Talib, that he should expel his nephew from the tribe. Only then would they be able to slay the Prophet. Abu Talib’s honour prevented him from taking this step. When Abu Talib, at the Quraysh’s behest, asked his nephew to stop criticizing their gods, the Prophet became concerned that his uncle would hand him over to the Quraysh. But Abu Talib immediately put his nephew's mind at rest. "By God, I will never hand you over to anyone," he told him.<sup>126</sup>

When all else failed, the Quraysh ostracised the Banu Hashim in the seventh year of the Prophet's mission. So Abu Talib took his nephew and his family out of Makkah, and they took up their abode in the ravine known after Abu Talib. There was nothing in this mountain pass except for a few wild trees. For three years, Abu Talib's family lived on the leaves and roots of these trees. Their only respite was during the four sacred months when the Banu Hashim used to come to Makkah. They would take back animals for sacrifice and live for a few months on the dried meat they prepared.

After three years, in the tenth year of the Prophet's mission, the pact to ostracize him that the Quraysh had made among themselves ended. The Banu Hashim were now able to return to Makkah. But the strain of the time in exile had been too much for Abu Talib, who died in the same year (A.D. 620). So 'Abd al-'Uzza, known as Abu Lahab, became chief of the Banu Hashim. He was an implacable opponent of the Prophet and took the decision Abu Talib had held back from. He expelled the Prophet from his tribe.

Expulsion

To expel an Arab from his tribe in those days was like putting him out among a pack of wolves. No government in those days was responsible for its citizens' safety. There was only the tribal system, and one could only live under the protection of a tribe. In the pilgrims' tents in Mina, the Prophet once preached his message to a particular tribe, but they refused to accept it. Still, one can tell from what one of their number, Maysirah ibn Masruq al-'Abbasi, had to say that the Prophet's words had impacted him. Ibn Kathir explains how the Prophet's hopes were raised about Maysirah. "How well you have spoken and how enlightening your words are. But my tribe does not agree with me, and one cannot go against one's tribe."<sup>127</sup> That was how much a tribe meant to a person. What a grave matter it must have been to be expelled from one's tribe.

The Prophet now had nowhere to go in his land. There was no other option but to seek the protection of some other tribe. His first attempt in this direction was his journey to Ta'if. Later, he explained the episode to his wife 'Aisha, saying he had "presented himself before Ibn 'Abd Yalil." In the words of 'Urwah ibn Zubayr, "When Abu Talib died, and the Prophet's affliction became more intense, he betook himself to the Thaqif tribe, hoping they would grant him asylum and support."<sup>128</sup> But one can tell what savage treatment the Prophet received at their hands from this prayer that he made on his return to Makkah:

Lord, I complain to you of my weakness and helplessness. How vulnerable I am among men, most Merciful one! <sup>129</sup>

After his return to Makkah, the Prophet commented that it was just as well that the people of Makkah had not heard about what had happened to him in Ta'if. If they had, it would have made them even more audacious.<sup>130</sup> The Prophet was unable to live within the city. He stayed outside and sent messages to various people, asking them to take him under their protection so that he could return to the city. Eventually, Mut'im ibn 'Adi agreed to extend protection to the Prophet, who, shielded by the swords of Mut'im's sons, once again entered the city walls.

Fairs, attended by tribes from all over Arabia, used to be held in various places in those days. The Prophet would go along and speak to different tribes hoping that one of them would agree to extend him protection. He explained his plight to his uncle 'Abbas. "I am not safe here with you and your relatives. Will you take me to the fair tomorrow so that we can visit people in their tents and talk to them?" he said to him.<sup>131</sup>

The Prophet would then go into people's tents and, presenting himself before them, would enquire what protection they could afford him. He would tell them that his people had rejected him and expelled him. "Protect me and grant me refuge so I can continue to preach the faith God has revealed to me." Historians have mentioned the names of fifteen tribes the Prophet approached individually, only to meet with one refusal after another. Although it was considered a shameful matter for someone to seek refuge from a tribe, and his request not be granted—in fact, this was the first notable example in Arab history of a person spending several years looking for a tribe to take him in—no one was prepared to shoulder this responsibility in the case of the Prophet. When a group from one tribe felt inclined to take pity upon the Prophet, one of their elders rebuked them: "His tribe has expelled him, and you intend to grant him protection. What do you want to do? Wage war upon the whole of the Arab nation?"<sup>132</sup> He knew that to offer refuge to a person his tribe had disowned, was to declare war against that tribe.

The Quraysh expelled him, and the Quraysh were masters of the entire Arab peninsula. To grant asylum to one expelled by them was to declare war on every Arab tribe—on everyone who looked up to the Quraysh as their leaders and guardians of the Holy Ka'bah. That was why, when the Ansar swore allegiance to the Prophet, Abu'l Haytham ibn al-Tayyihan warned them: "If you take him with you, the whole Arab nation will descend upon you with one accord."<sup>133</sup>

Added to this, there was the fact that Arab border tribes had made pacts with neighbouring foreign powers. These tribes feared repercussions if they took a controversial personality like the Prophet. As Ibn Kathir has explained in Al-Bidayah wa al-Nihayah, the Prophet once went into the tent of the Banu Shayban ibn Tha'labah in Makkah and talked with their elders. They were impressed by the Prophet's words but finally decided that their position on the border of Persia was too precarious for them to take responsibility for the Prophet. As their spokesman, Hani ibn Qubaisah, put it, they had made pacts with the Persian emperor, and “it might be that kings will not take kindly to the message that you preach.”<sup>134</sup>

The Prophet was desperate to find a tribe that would afford him protection, for there was no other way to continue his mission. Once, he went to see a tribe which went by the name of Banu ‘Abdullah. After the Prophet had, as usual, called them to Islam and presented himself to them in the hope that they would grant him asylum, he said: “Banu ‘Abdullah, what a beautiful name your forefather had.” But they were untouched by his evident goodwill and rejected his proposals.<sup>135</sup>

The last three years of the Prophet’s time in Makkah were spent among various tribes, looking for one to grant him asylum. Yet despite his untiring efforts, no tribe was ready to take him in. Some of the people he approached used to taunt him, saying, “Isn’t it high time that you despaired of us?” Eventually, God gave the tribes of Aws and Khazraj, which hailed from Madinah, the courage to extend the Prophet their support. There was one particular psychological reason for their decision. In their vicinity dwelt Jewish tribes, notably the Jews of Khaybar, who had possession of the most fertile lands in the area and control of the region’s commerce. Many of the Aws and Khazraj were given employment by them, but the work was so hard and the recompense so inadequate that it was more like slavery for them. (Mention is made of this by the Prophet when, after the emigration to Madinah, he had his companions build the Prophet's mosque with their own hands. According to Ibn Kathir, the Prophet commented that "this is not the labour of Khaybar; this is much more worthwhile and honest work.") In economic domination by the Jews and their exploitation of the Madinan tribes, fighting often broke out between the Jews on the one side and the Aws and Khazraj on the other. The Jews used to deride these tribes, telling them that a Prophet would soon come among the Arabs and that when he did, they would join forces with him and eliminate the Aws and Khazraj.

When the Aws and Khazraj heard the teachings of the Prophet Muhammad, they recognized him as the prophet the Jews had taunted them with, and they made haste to accept him before the Jews could do so. Moreover, there were other historical reasons for it being comparatively easier for the Aws and Khazraj to understand the message brought by the Prophet and to believe in him personally than it was for the other tribes. They did not deliberate long, therefore, before swearing allegiance to him.

So the time, which the Prophet had been awaiting for years, finally came. He had found a place in which, under tribal protection, he would be able to continue his struggle effectively. The Muslims of Makkah and the surrounding territories would be gathered together in one centre. The fact that most of the people of Madinah accepted Islam made it easier for the Muslims' scattered resources to be brought together in one place and used more effectively to further the Islamic cause. When the Aws and the Khazraj swore allegiance, the Prophet quickly returned to his companions.

“Praise God,” he told them, “for today, Rabi’ah’s offspring have as good as overcome the Persians.”<sup>136</sup> The Prophet saw how the Ansar strengthened Islam by taking the Muslims in. He realized it would only be a matter of time before the Muslims conquered mighty Persia.

The Prophet began to make preparations for emigration to Madinah. He was to take six months after the conversion of the Aws and Khazraj to do this. All this while he attempted to maintain the utmost secrecy, but still the polytheists, the Quraysh, learnt of his plans to leave. They heard about the refuge he had been granted in Madinah and the protection the Ansar had extended him. The fact that the Ansar had accepted Islam also came to their notice, and they learned that the Muslims were gathering in Madinah. Plotting against the Prophet, they decided to take him captive at his departure and kill or keep him prisoner.<sup>137</sup> But their plans came to nothing. When all his arrangements were complete, he succeeded in migrating to Madinah in total secrecy.

ISLAM COMES TO MADINAH

Before the coming of Islam, the city of Madinah was known as Yathrib. Besides the two main tribes of the Aws and Khazraj, some Jewish tribes lived in the area and established their dominance by pursuing a policy of divide and rule. Their prime concern was keeping their Arab neighbours weak and disunited. Just five years before the Prophet emigrated to Madinah, the Khazraj, at the instigation of the Jews, rose against the Aws. An Aws chieftain named Abu'l Baysar Anas ibn Rafi' went to Makkah along with a few of his fellows to seek the Quraysh's help. Hearing about their arrival, the Prophet went to see them and invited them to accept Islam.

One of their companions, a youth named Ayas ibn Mu'adh, was impressed by the Prophet's words. He told his companions this was much better than they had come for, but they disagreed. Abu'l Baysar threw some earth in Ayas' face in disgust and told him to forget what Muhammad had said, for they had other, more pressing business.

The Aws delegation returned without accepting Islam. Soon afterwards, the Aws and Khazraj fought a war known as Bu'ath. The enmity between the two tribes had become so intense that each wished to obliterate the other. In this war, the Khazraj first had ascendancy. Then the Aws, under Abu Usayd, defeated the Khazraj. They inflicted heavy losses on one another, even burning houses and orchards. In this way, the Arabs weakened themselves through their internal warfare.

It was the Jews who benefited from this war, and their ascendancy in Madinah was further consolidated. When feelings cooled, responsible people of both the Aws and the Khazraj realized they had made a grave mistake. They had played into the hands of their enemies. They had weakened themselves and strengthened the Jews. Many people in both tribes realized the need to rectify this situation. But this could be done only by both tribes agreeing to forgive and forget. The best way to achieve reconciliation would be by appointing a king to coordinate peacemaking. ‘Abdullah ibn Ubayy of the Khazraj tribe, a man of personality and gifted with leadership qualities, was chosen for this task. At this very juncture, some Khazrajis travelled to Makkah on a pilgrimage. There they met the Prophet, Muhammad. He told them God had sent him with the true religion and called on them to believe in him. The Prophet’s words rang a bell in their minds. They remembered that the Jews used to tell them that a Prophet who would reign supreme would soon be coming. The Jews used to rejoice in the promise of his coming, for they envisaged joining forces with him to vanquish the Arabs permanently. The people of Madinah realized this was the Prophet the Jews had told them about.

Here was a golden opportunity to accept him before the Jews could do so.

So, expressing their belief in the Prophet, they told him, "We have left our people behind. No nation is torn by hostility and infighting as they are. Perhaps God will unite them through you. We will return to them and tell them about our accepted religion. If our people unite on this faith, then there will be no one more powerful than you in this land."<sup>138</sup>

After this, the people of Madinah accepted Islam in large numbers. As a result, they became known as the Ansar, or helpers, of Islam. Their selfless support of Islam enabled the Prophet's religion to gain supremacy in Arabia.

Five years before the Prophet's emigration to Madinah, the city's people had thought nothing of his message and rejected it. Yet just five years later, these same people accepted Islam. When they first met the Prophet, they were preoccupied with military considerations; they could think of nothing else but how to subdue their enemies. This meant that they had no time to consider spiritual matters. As a result, God and life after death appeared to them to be extraneous issues designed to divert them from their real aim.

The Aws and the Khazraj poured all their resources into the war of Bu'ath. All they received in return, however, was self-destruction. The very future of the two tribes was cast into doubt: it seemed as if the Jews would set them against one another until they were annihilated.

These thoughts ushered in a change of attitude. They began to think of peace instead of war and unity instead of civil conflict. They started setting their relations with their neighbours in a broader context than the battlefield. They saw that the problem lay more between the Arab tribes of the Aws and Khazraj on one side and the Jews on the other than between the two Arab tribes themselves. If the Aws and Khazraj could unite on a single platform, they could present a united front to the Jews. A unifying faith was just what they needed to heal the wounds of tribal conflict and patch up the differences between the two tribes. And if they could find a leader acceptable to both sides, he would be able to see the process of reconciliation through to its completion. In the person of the Prophet Muhammad, they found the leader and the faith they needed. So they rushed to accept his religion.

Islam, then, benefited indirectly from the war of Bu'ath, for it made the Aws and Khazraj realize the futility of war and seek peace among themselves. They found this peace in Islam and united with one another as helpers of the Prophet. The incident of Bu'ath, according to 'Aisha, was the tragedy that proved to be the turning point for the people of Medina, after this war they were ready for peace, and they accepted the Prophet of Islam as their religious guide.

EMIGRATION— FROM MAKKAH TO MADINAH

The Prophet's emigration from Makkah to Madinah was the most important event in Islamic history. That is why the companions marked the beginning of the Islamic calendar with this event. But to understand the real significance of emigration, it is necessary to remove the dust of legends and fairy tales that have, over the years, accumulated over the glass case of history.

One of these myths has grown over the Prophet's stay in the Cave of Thawr on his way from Makkah to Madinah. The Quraysh were hot on his heels, and he took refuge in the cave to hide from them. The story goes that God commanded a spider to weave a web at the cave door after the Prophet entered. Then He commanded a dove to come and lay an egg on top of the web, thus—providentially—giving the impression that the cave was uninhabited. But as is usual with such events, the facts of the Prophet's emigration to Madinah have been exaggerated and distorted beyond recognition. This is clear from the actual historical version of what happened.

As the historian Ibn Kathir has pointed out, the most reliable account of events is that Imam Ahmad gave on the authority of ‘Abdullah ibn Abbas. This is how the account goes:

They (the Quraysh) followed close on the heels of the Prophet, but when they reached the mountain, they lost a trace of him. They then climbed the mountain and passed by a cave. Noting a spider’s web at the mouth of the cave, they said to one another, “If he had entered this cave, the spider’s web would not have remained intact.”<sup>139</sup>

It is not explicitly stated that they saw the cave of Thawr. Even if we accept that it was, all that is clear from this account is that they saw a spider’s web in the mouth of a cave. There is no mention of God commanding a spider to weave a web after the entry of the Prophet or of His making a dove lay its egg on top of the web. Such additions are fanciful and are the result of wishful thinking.

The greatest damage caused by such interpolations is that they divert one’s attention to fantastic, far-fetched tales and cause one to miss the real lesson, which is to be derived from purely factual accounts.

The Emigrants are Made to Feel at Home

How the tribes of Madinah aided the Prophet is one of the most extraordinary events in history. Because of their assistance, they became known as the Ansar—the Helpers. Usually, when people give something, it is in return for some favour or to ingratiate themselves with someone. Some provide offerings for “holy men” because they think doing so will cause blessings to descend on their families and properties. But the emigration of the Prophet is perhaps the only example of people opening their doors to destitute and forlorn refugees when they had nothing to gain and probably a great deal to lose by doing so. The action of the Ansar was based entirely on their dedicated commitment to the cause of Islam. They accommodated the emigrants in their homes, treated them as brothers and sisters, and shared their possessions with them. And they did all this, fully conscious that their action involved much more than economic sacrifice. They knew full well that what they were doing would arouse the hostility of the most powerful factions in both Arabia and Persia. There are no words more fitting than those of ‘Ali to describe them: “They were true to their word, steadfast in adversity.”<sup>140</sup>

When the Muhajirun forsook their own country for Madinah, every Ansar was eager to extend hospitality to them. They even drew lots among themselves for the privilege of being able to entertain such noble guests. They handed over the better part of their properties to the Muhajirun. And all this even though, in their oath of allegiance, it was explicitly laid down that others would be given priority over them. Though they had made the most extreme sacrifices for the sake of Islam, they did not show the slightest disapproval of this clause.<sup>141</sup>

Despite all the assistance, the Prophet did not have an easy life in Madinah. Apprehensions that the whole of Arabia would unite against the Muslims proved only too true. This is how Ubayy ibn Ka'b, a companion of the Prophet, describes the situation:

When the Prophet and his companions arrived in Madinah, and the Ansar gave them asylum, the Arabs united against them. The Muslims used to remain in their armour, night and day.<sup>142</sup>

The Quraysh declared economic sanctions against the people of Madinah. All Arab tribes, following the Quraysh's lead, severed links with the city. Internal resources ran far short of providing for the considerably increased population of Madinah, and the expense of defending the town pushed the economy to its very limit. 'Umar says that the Prophet was restless with hunger all day in Madinah. There were not even enough rejected dates for him to eat his fill. In later years, someone asked 'Aisha if they had a lantern. "If we had had oil to burn a lantern," she said, "we would have drunk it." The Muslims used to go out on expeditions with hardly any provisions. Abu Musa tells of one expedition he made with the Prophet. "There was only one camel between the six of us. We used to take turns riding on it. The skin began peeling off our feet from incessant walking, and we used to bind them with rags. That was why the expedition came to be known as Dhat al-Riqā, (riqā meaning rags or patches)."

Food rations used to run so low that people used to suck dates rather than eat them. Acacia leaves and locusts would make up the rest of their diet. Additionally, the Muhajirun had to contend with a drastic diet change. In Makkah, they had been used to a diet of meat and milk. In Madinah, dates constituted the major portion of their diet. Tabarani had related an incident one day when the Prophet came to take the Friday congregational prayer. A Makkan Muslim called out to him: "Prophet of God, these dates have burnt our intestines."<sup>143</sup>

The emigration to Madinah was a watershed in Islamic history. From a practical point of view, Islam emerged from a purely missionary episode and entered a period of active confrontation. During the period when he was solely concerned with preaching, the Prophet used to work according to one hard-and-fast principle. He used to steer clear of all controversial issues and concentrate entirely on giving the good news of the joys of paradise and warnings of the punishment of hell. He would avoid any discussion of political, economic and tribal affairs. When he preached the message of Islam to the Banu 'Amir ibn Sa'sa'ah tribe at the fair of 'Ukaz, he assured them at the same time that all he would do was peacefully pursue his preaching work; he would not raise any extraneous issue. "I am God's Prophet," he said. "If I come amongst you, will you protect me so I can continue communicating my message? I will not force you on any matter."<sup>144</sup>

In Madinah, preaching work remained the primary purpose of the Prophet's mission. But the spectrum had broadened, and now Islam had to take account of social issues as well. The policy adopted by the Prophet at this juncture was aimed at softening people's hearts towards Islam so that the purpose of his mission could be achieved without conflict. "I have been assisted by the feelings of awe which I inspire—this has been the equivalent of one month's journey," he once said. Usually, his missions were carried through to success by sheer force of personality.

There were two complementary aspects to this method: one was based on overawing the opponents of Islam, while the other aimed to plant the seed of love in them. The first meant accumulating strength awesome enough to convince the opponents of Islam that they could not beat it and that being so, they had best come to its fold.<sup>145</sup>

The second way was to offer gifts to the opponents of Islam to soften their hearts towards Islam and Muslims.<sup>146</sup> The generosity that the Prophet showed to win people over to his cause was without a peer. No one before or after him can lay claim to such boundless munificence. Safwan ibn Umayyah, a noble of Makkah, hid in a mountain ravine. After the Muslim conquest of Makkah, the Prophet extended an amnesty to him and asked to see him. After Hawazin had been subdued, the Prophet was overseeing the distribution of spoils at Ji'ranah. Safwan ibn Umayyah was with him. As yet, he had not accepted Islam. Standing on the gully's side, he gazed wonderfully at the goats and camels swarming beneath him. "Abu Wahab," the Prophet enquired on seeing him, “would you like all these cattle?” Safwan said that he would. “It’s all yours,” the Prophet told him. “No one but a Prophet could be so generous,” Safwan replied. He immediately accepted Islam and testified that there was no one worthy of being served to save God and that Muhammad was His servant and Prophet.<sup>147</sup>

The Prophet’s numerous marriages were also part of this policy. Prime importance was attached in the tribal system to relationships through marriage. This gives us insight into the marriages the Prophet entered after emigrating to Madinah. They established relationships with countless people whose hearts then mellowed towards his mission. The Prophet’s first marriage was with Khadijah, a widow almost twice his age. Except for that one marriage, his other marriages were entered into for the political and missionary advantages that accrued to Islam from them.

The year after the Peace of Hudaibiyyah (A.D. 628), the Prophet and 2000 Muslims went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Ka’bah. During his three-day stay in Makkah, he married a widow named Maymunah bint al Harith. She had eight sisters, all married into distinguished Makkan families. By marrying her, the Prophet became related to all these eight families. Khalid ibn al-Walid was Maymunah’s nephew, and she had brought him up as a son. So Khalid, the Quraysh’s greatest warrior, became the Prophet’s stepson. After this, Khalid did not join in any hostilities against the Muslims, and before long, he entered the fold of Islam. After his marriage to Maymunah, the Prophet arranged a wedding reception for the people of Makkah, but the Quraysh reminded him that—according to the Treaty of Hdaybiyyah—he was only allowed to remain in Makkah for three days. After that, his period was up, and he would have to leave the city immediately. So the wedding reception, aimed at attracting people to the faith, could not occur. But Khalid ibn al-Walid and ‘Amr ibn al-’As had become Muslim together. So that, on their arrival in Madinah, people exclaimed: “With these two in the bag, Makkah has been tamed.”

Umm Habibah, the daughter of Abu Sufyan, a prominent member of the Quraysh, and her husband Ubaydullah ibn Jahsh accepted Islam and emigrated to Abyssinia. There, however, the husband became a Christian. Not long after that, he died. Hearing of this, the Prophet arranged to marry Umm Habibah by proxy. After the death of Abu Jahl in the field of Badr, Abu Sufyan became the most prominent leader of the Quraysh. The Prophet would now be his son-in-law. The marriage had to be completed by proxy, for it was feared that if Umm Habibah returned to Makkah, her father would not allow the marriage. The ceremony was then conducted by Najashi, King of Abyssinia, and the bride left immediately for Madinah. With this relationship established, Abu Sufyan’s enmity toward the Prophet mellowed, and he converted to Islam one day before the conquest of Makkah.

The other aspect of this policy was that of “striking terror” into the hearts of the enemies of Islam. This consisted of mustering up enough strength and making such a show of it that there would be no need to use it. The defeat of the Muslims at Uhud (A.H. 3) could have turned into a rout if Abu Sufyan had followed up his victory with another attack instead of returning to Makkah. Indeed, when he reached Ruha, he realized his mistake and made to turn once again on the Muslims’ stronghold. But even in utter disarray, the Prophet’s information system worked effectively. He heard about Abu Sufyan’s intention and decided to meet him. Immediately he reassembled his shaken army and set off towards Makkah.

Contrary to his moral practice of maintaining a veil of secrecy over military manoeuvres, this expedition was given a fanfare of publicity. When the Muslims reached Hamra al-Asad, eight miles from Madinah, Abu Sufyan heard of the pursuit. Thinking that fresh reinforcements must have arrived, he gave up his idea of attacking Madinah and returned to Makkah. The Prophet returned to Madinah when he became sure of Abu Sufyan’s army withdrawal.

One year after the Battle of Mu’tah, which occurred in the month of Jumada al-Awwal, A.H. 8, the Byzantine emperor started gathering his forces on the Syrian border.

The Ghassanids and other Roman allies among Arab tribes in the region followed the emperor's lead. In response, the Prophet advanced to Tabuk with an army of 30,000. The expedition to Tabuk was a military manoeuvre, a pre-emptive strike. The aim was to strike fear into the enemy so they would lose heart and abandon their hostile intentions. When the Prophet reached Tabuk, he heard that Caesar was not advancing to meet the Muslims but, instead, was beginning to withdraw his forces from the frontier. There was now no question of a battle, and Caesar's very withdrawal had assured the Prophet of a moral victory, which he decided to turn to his political advantage. During his 20-day stay in Tabuk, he established contact with the neighbouring Arab tribes, who were at that time under Roman influence. As a result, the Christian chieftain of Daumat al Jandal, Ukaydir ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Kindi, Yuhannah ibn Ruyah from Aylah, along with Christians of Maqna, Jarba and Azruh, agreed to pay jizyah, a tax levied on non-Muslims living under the protection of a Muslim government, which guarantees the safety of their lives and property, and free exercise of their religion.

The same reason lay behind the expedition under Usamah, undertaken soon after the death of the Prophet. Except for the tribes of Madinah, the whole of Arabia had risen in revolt when the Prophet died. Suddenly the Muslims found themselves at odds with all their Arab countrymen. It appeared expedient to preserve all strength in Madinah to counter the enemy within. But rather than do this, Abu Bakr acted on a decision taken by the Prophet. A force of 700 men was sent to the Roman front under Usamah. Abu Hurayrah explains the impact that this expedition had on the rebellious Arab tribes:

When Usamah's force passed those tribes by that were on the verge of apostasy, they would exclaim: "If the Muslims did not have great reserves of strength, they would never have despatched a force like this. Let us leave them to fight against the Romans.' The Muslims fought against the Romans and defeated them, returning safely after battling with them. Seeing this, those thinking of apostasy became firm in Islam."<sup>148</sup>

When the Prophet reached Madinah, there were, besides a small minority of polytheists, two main communities living there—the Jews and the Muslims. These two communities were split up into several small groups. Neither was able to present a united front. People were waiting for someone who would organize and unite them. When the Prophet realized this was what people wanted, he issued a decree in which Jews and Muslims were recognized as communities in their own right. "The Jews are a community along with the Muslims... They shall have their religion and the Muslims theirs." No encroachment was made on the customary rights and responsibilities of either Jews or Muslims, and acceptable concessions were made to the sentiments of both communities. A clause was added, however, which read as follows:

Whenever there is a disagreement about something, the matter should be referred to God Almighty and Muhammad.<sup>149</sup>

This decree amounted to a political initiative that, most tactfully and ingeniously, introduced the Islamic constitutional government to Madinah.

Instead of appeasing the Quraysh, the Prophet's departure to Madinah aroused their anger to new intensity levels. They saw the Muslims gathering in one place and becoming stronger. Only two years elapsed before the Prophet decided whether to meet the Quraysh army outside the city or allow them to enter Madinah and cast the newly built nest of Islam into disarray. The Quraysh had 950 men in their army, while the Muslims numbered only 313. But the Prophet's insight told him that solely negative impulses moved the Quraysh.

Hatred of the Muslims, and jealousy of the Prophet, lay behind their aggression. The Muslims, on the other hand, were moved by the most positive and noble instincts. They had faith in God to spur them on and the certainty that they were fighting for a genuine cause. The Muslims, then, were immeasurably more strongly motivated than their foes. Besides this, Arab warfare was a personal affair. Every warrior sought to make a name for himself by exhibiting his bravery. Faith in God had removed this weakness from the Muslims. The Prophet was the first person in Arab history to command his forces to pursue a united course of action and fight in ranks. He stressed the importance of fighting, not as individuals, but as a unit. The believers were urged to destroy the Quraysh's strength with the strength of solidarity:

God loves those who fight for His cause in ranks as if they were a solid, cemented edifice.<sup>150</sup>

Faith and the Muslims' ability to fight as one unit brought about the first victory of Islamic history—the Battle of Badr.

Victory of Islam

Defeat at Badr had the effect of further provoking the Quraysh, and several battles, notably those of Uhud (A.H. 3) and the Trench (A.H. 5), ensued within the space of a few years. The Muslims ran into severe difficulties during these campaigns. For example, the 800 who participated in the Battle of the Trench suffered extreme cold, hunger and exhaustion. So much so that no one stood up when the Prophet asked someone to volunteer for a spying foray into the enemy camp. Eventually, the Prophet personally delegated this task to Huzayfah.

There were also recurrent problems with the Jews of Madinah, who, in alliance with the Quraysh, were always conspiring against the Muslims. As a result, Madinah was besieged for twenty days during the Battle of the Trench. Finally, the Quraysh were forced by a violent sandstorm to return to Makkah. Now that collaboration with the Quraysh had been exposed; the Prophet chose this time to solve this problem. There were three Jewish tribes in and around Madinah—the Banu Nadir, Banu Qaynuqah and Banu Qurayzah. Immediately after the Battle of the Trench, they were besieged and exiled, applying their Judaic law. The threat that they had posed to the Muslims in Madinah was thus permanently eliminated.

Then there was the problem of Khaybar. Six years after the Prophet's emigration, Madinah was an island of Islam between the Quraysh in Makkah, 400 kilometres to the south, and the Jews in Khaybar, 200 kilometres to the north. The Quraysh and the Jews were united in their enmity towards Islam, but neither being strong enough to take the Muslims on alone, they had negotiated to set out a joint action plan against the Muslims. The latter, for their part, were not in a position to take on both enemies simultaneously.

Against this background, the Prophet, acting under divine inspiration, set out for Makkah in the year A.H. 6, along with 1400 companions. He clarified that the Muslims had no intention of fighting anybody and were going for Umrah. The sacrificial camels, which the Muslims took with them, further proved their peaceful intentions. The camels were even given the sacrificial emblem, known as qaladah, so the people of Makkah could be sure they were meant for sacrifice. This journey was also aimed at allaying the fears of the Quraysh that the Muslims intended to destroy the Ka'bah's religious and commercial status.

As expected, the Quraysh advanced to prevent the Muslims from entering Makkah. The two parties met at Hudaibiyyah, some eleven kilometres from Makkah. Anxious to avoid hostilities, the Prophet set up camp then and there. He then sent a message to the Quraysh, suggesting a peace treaty between the two sides. He impressed his envoys that they had not come to fight anybody. "We have come as pilgrims. War weakened and caused the Quraysh to suffer great losses. If they wish, I am willing to make a truce with them: they shall not come in between myself and the people during that time. If I emerge supreme, and they so wish, they can accept the religion others have accepted. If I do not emerge supreme, they will have the right to do as they please. If the Quraysh refuse this offer, I will fight with them to support my cause, even at the risk of losing my life. And what God wishes will come to pass."<sup>151</sup>

The theme of this message shows that the Prophet was appealing to a soft spot in the Quraysh's psyche. When the Prophet first commenced his public mission in Makkah, 'Utbah ibn Rabi'ah came to him on behalf of the Quraysh. When he returned to his people, this is what he had to say to them:

Leave this fellow to continue with his work for, God knows, he will never give it up. Do not prevent him from preaching to the Arabs. If he wins them over, then his honour will be your own. If they prevail over him, then, thanks to others, you will be free of him.<sup>152</sup>

The Prophet thus appealed to the Quraysh in the same terms they had been thinking; consequently, he could find supporters of his peace initiative within the enemy camp itself.

The Prophet sent the Quraysh this message and, at the same time, initiated various procedures aimed at influencing them. One Banu Kinanah came from Makkah to Hudaibiyyah to ascertain the Muslims' intentions. When the Prophet heard about his impending arrival, he told his followers of the Banu Kinanah's reverence for sacrificial camels and directed them to take them with them when they met him. They did so, simultaneously chanting the pilgrimage prayer—"We are here at your service, Lord...". The Quraysh's envoy was highly impressed. On his return to Makkah, he told the Quraysh that he was sure the Muslims had come on a pilgrimage for no other reason and should be allowed to carry on.

The spectacle of 1400 Muslims displaying their faith in God also profoundly impacted the Quraysh. When one of their envoys came into the Muslim camp, the Muslims were all praying in ranks, lined up behind the Prophet. He was highly impressed by the organization and discipline of the worshippers. When he returned to the Quraysh, he told them that the Muslims worked as a unit: when Muhammad made a move, all his followers did likewise. Another envoy saw that when the Prophet performed his ablutions, the Muslims rushed to catch the water he had used in their hands before it could touch the ground. He noticed the hush, which descended upon them when the Prophet spoke, the reverence preventing them from looking him straight in the eye. When this envoy reported back to the Quraysh, they were deeply impressed by his description of the Muslims' loyalty and affection for their leader. 'Urwah ibn Mas'ud asked them: "Are you not as my fathers and sons?" The people told him that they were indeed. "Are you suspicious of me in any way?" he asked them. They said not. "Well," 'Urwah continued, "this man (Muhammad) has made a good proposal to you. Agree to it, and let me go to confer with him."<sup>153</sup>

The Prophet made clear his intention to accept any demand the Quraysh made as long as it did not contradict the law of God. The Quraysh displayed all manner of bigotry while the treaty was being compiled. They removed the words "Muhammad, Messenger of God" from the draft and inserted "Muhammad, son of 'Abdullah" instead. Taking offence at the words "In the Name of God, the Beneficent, the Merciful," they insisted on "In Your Name, Oh God," being written. Finally, they added a clause saying that any Quraysh who joined the Muslims must be returned.

On the other hand, the Quraysh would not have to do the same with any Muslim who came to them. They refused the Muslims permission to enter Makkah for their pilgrimage that year. These clauses were more than the Companions could bear. 'Urwah ibn Mas'ud even commented that those whom the Prophet had gathered around himself were about to desert him. ‘Urwah’s remark was too much for the normally placid Abu Bakr, who sternly rebuked him and said, “So you think that we will leave the Prophet on his own?” But the Prophet himself refused to be provoked. He accepted all the Quraysh’s demands and completed a ten-year truce with them. As long as the truce lasted, the Quraysh were prevented—directly or indirectly—from participating in any hostilities against the Muslims.

This treaty weighed so heavily on the Muslims that, after it had been completed, no one responded to repeated calls by the Prophet for the sacrifice of the camels they had brought with them. So it was with heavy hearts that they finally rose to make the sacrifice. So much so that when they shaved their heads afterwards, it seemed as if they were going to cut one another’s throats, so deep was their sorrow. But this truce, the terms of which appeared so unfavourable to the Muslims, was destined to reap incalculable benefits for them later.

At the time of the truce, two main enemies confronted the Muslims—the Jews of Khaybar and the Quraysh of Makkah. The Muslims were not yet strong enough to face both simultaneously. Attacking one would have given the other a golden opportunity to attack Madinah from the rear, thus demolishing the Muslims’ stronghold. By accepting all the Quraysh’s demands, the Prophet had consolidated a ten-year truce with one of the two. No longer could they conduct forays against the Muslims. With the Quraysh out of his way, the Prophet could now turn his attention to the Jews of Khaybar. The attack on Khaybar (Muharram A.H. 7) followed quickly after the Treaty of Hudaibiyyah (Dhu'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 6), finally solving the Jewish problem.

Twenty thousand armed men were holding out in the eight mighty fortresses of Khaybar. The fortresses were also equipped with highly sophisticated defences. The story of this fortified city's sacking is long, in which methods of extraordinary military ingenuity were used. First, the town gate was broken with a massive tree trunk wielded by about fifty men. A few strong blows were enough to break the gate, allowing the Muslims to enter amidst a hail of arrows and stones. Four fortresses were captured in this manner. The rest took fright, opened their gates, and put themselves at the mercy of the Muslim army.

There remained the Quraysh to be subdued. The Prophet's intuition told him to wait until they broke the treaty before entering the battlefield with them. The Prophet knew the negative sentiments that spurred the Quraysh in their fight against the Muslims. Since the former was motivated by feelings of jealousy, hate, greed and arrogance, the Prophet realized that they would stop short of no immoral and unreasonable action in pursuit of their aims. His estimate proved correct. In Sha'ban A.H. 8, fighting erupted between the tribes of Khuza'ah and Banu Bakr. The Banu Bakr were allied to the Quraysh and the Khuza'ah to the Muslims. In blatant contradiction to the terms of the Treaty of Hdaybiyyah, the Quraysh provided their allies with clandestine support, enabling them to attack the Khuza'ah. This incident occurred just two years after the Treaty of Hdaybiyyah. During this time, the number of people with the Prophet had risen from 1,500 to 10,000. Along with them, the Prophet secretly set out for Makkah. So wise and diplomatic was his strategy that Makkah was conquered with next to no bloodshed:

God has promised you many gains, which you will acquire, and thus He has given you this beforehand, and He has restrained the hands of men from you.<sup>154</sup>

When the Treaty of Hdaybiyyah was signed, the Prophet had been preaching for twenty years. The message of Islam spread throughout the Arabian Peninsula. There were people in every tribe whose hearts the Prophet's religion had found a place. But they still looked up to the Quraysh as their leaders. Many who realized the truth of Islam could not proclaim their faith out of fear of the Quraysh. They knew that declaration of Islam amounted to war against the mightiest tribe in Arabia. They heard that the Muslims and the Quraysh had agreed to curtail hostilities for ten years. The Quraysh would no longer be able to take reprisals against people becoming Muslims. There was now nothing to stop people from accepting Islam. It was as if a large crowd had gathered at the gate of Islam. The gate was thrown open with the Treaty of Hdaybiyyah, and the crowds flocked in.

As Ibn Shahab al-Zahri and others have pointed out, the Muslims gained more from the Treaty of Hudaibiyyah than from any of their campaigns. The Prophet returned to Makkah two years later with 10,000 men, whereas previously, the Muslims had numbered no more than 3,000. This directly resulted from removing the greatest obstacle to Islam acceptance—the Quraysh's anger and irritation, which would result from such a move. Bara' was one of the Muslims present at Hudaibiyyah. Bukhari has related how he used to say to later-day people, those who considered the Conquest of Makkah to be the great victory of Islam, that the Companions of the Prophet used to think of the Peace Treaty of Hudaibiyyah as an outstanding victory.

The economic blockade of Madinah was now lifted. Caravans from that city were now permitted to pass freely through Makkah. But Abu Jandal, Abu Basir, and others who had accepted Islam had to be returned to the Quraysh under the treaty's terms. Before long, however, they escaped and took refuge in Dhu'l-Marwah. So many Muslim converts assembled in that place that it became Islam's new, flourishing centre. From there, they used to play havoc with the Quraysh's trading caravans. Finally, the Quraysh were forced to abandon their insistence that anyone deserting the Quraysh for the Muslim camp would have to be returned to the Quraysh.

The great lesson of Hudaibiyyah is that one should avoid impatience and not judge matters by appearances alone. The outwardly unfavourable Treaty of Hudaibiyyah held great opportunities for the Muslims, which only people of insight could perceive. Ibn ‘Asakir recorded some comments of Abu Bakr on the Treaty of Hudaibiyyah. “It was the greatest Islamic victory,” he said, “though people were too shortsighted on that day to realize the secrets between Muhammad and his Lord. People are impatient, but God is not. He lets matters take their course until they reach his intended stage.” Realism brings success in this world, but people want instant success and are unwilling to go through the lengthy stages it takes to achieve it.

After finishing with Khaybar, the Prophet began preparing for another campaign. The target he kept secret, not even telling Abu Bakr where they would be advancing. Only in Ramadan A.H. 8, when the Muslim army was directed to set out towards Makkah, did people realize where they were heading. So stealthy and discreet was their advance that they reached Marruz-Zahran without the Quraysh knowing that the Muslims were upon them. The Prophet had prayed before he set out that “the spies and informers of the Quraysh” should be restrained until the Muslims entered the city of Makkah.

The Prophet went to great lengths to keep preparations for the advance on Makkah secret. He ordered Madinah to be cut off from the rest of Arabia: no one was allowed to enter or leave the city. A party under ‘Ali was sent to guard the roads leading to Madinah. They arrested Hatib ibn Abi Balta’ah’s messenger, who was taking a letter to the people of Makkah warning them of the danger to their city. As Tabarani reported on the authority of Ibn ‘Abbas, “every tribe provided manpower and weaponry in full measure.”

No one was left behind. The army of 10,000 was divided into groups of several hundred men. Each division marched in ranks, led by a commander bearing a standard. The Prophet asked his uncle (Abbas to let Abu Sufyan, an old opponent of the Prophet, witness the Muslims’ march. Abu Sufyan watched from beside a narrow mountain pass as, row upon row; the Muslim army filed past. He could hardly believe his eyes. “Who has the power to confront this army?” he exclaimed. “I have never seen anything like it.” The Prophet thus went to great lengths to impress Abu Sufyan. At the same time, he announced that anyone entering Abu Sufyan’s house would be safe. The result was that Abu Sufyan himself appealed to the people of Makkah to capitulate before Muhammad, for no one was strong enough to fight him. Events, which followed the conquest of the city, prove that the extensive preparations were not aimed at causing bloodshed: they were aimed at frightening the Makkans into submission so that the city could be captured for Islam without any need for fighting. As the Muslim army neared Makkah, one of its leaders, Sa’d ibn ‘Ubadah, said, “Today is the day of battle!” The Prophet told him it was not; it was the day of mercy. Saad was then told to step down, and the standard was handed over to his son instead.

There were some engagements after the Conquest of Makkah, bringing the total number of military expeditions that the Prophet conducted up to eighty. But now that the Muslims had gained control of the capital of Arabia, it entailed only minor skirmishes before all of Arabia capitulated and accepted the Prophet as their leader.

VICTORY AND AFTER

Victors usually tend to be susceptible to two kinds of feelings—pride and vengeance. However, after his conquest of Makkah in A.H. 8, the Prophet of Islam displayed neither of these traits. His victory was that of a Prophet of God. According to Ibn Ishaq, when the Prophet entered Makkah, his head was bowed so low that people saw his beard touching the camel's saddle. Such was the humility of the Prophet, even in his hour of triumph. Standing at the door of the Kaaba, the Prophet delivered an address, in the course of which he said,

There is none worthy of being served save the One God. He has fulfilled His promise and offered succour to His slave. He alone has brought the hosts of enemies low.<sup>155</sup>

He did not, in other words, claim any credit for the victory: he attributed it entirely to God. Later on, in the same speech, he had this to say to the Quraysh:

“What do you think I will do with you now?” “We think you will treat us well.” they replied, “for you are our noble brother and the son of our noble brother.” Then the Prophet said: “I say to you as Joseph said to his brothers: Let no reproach be upon you this day. Go, you are free.”<sup>156</sup>

At the very outset, the Prophet put vengeance aside, thus eliminating all possibility of adverse reaction on the part of his new subjects. A nation defeated on the field of battle usually resorts to clandestine resistance. By granting a general amnesty, the Prophet nipped resistance in the bud. Forces, which might have sought to destroy the fortress of Islam, were thus engaged in building it.

When the Prophet entered Makkah after the city's conquest, he gave his commanders orders not to battle with anyone unless they were attacked. He forgave all those who had committed outrages against him. Only a few, who were to be killed "even if they took refuge beneath the curtain of the Kaaba," were sentenced to death. Ibn Hisham, and other biographers of the Prophet, have mentioned them individually. Here are their names and the nature of their cases:

1. 'Abdullah ibn Sa'd, who had become Muslim and been appointed as a scribe of revelation by the Prophet. He later reneged and joined the infidels. After the Conquest of Makkah, when he heard that the Prophet had ordered his execution, he took refuge with his foster milk brother 'Uthman. The latter sheltered him, then took him to the Prophet with a request again to accept his conversion to Islam. The Prophet remained silent. Then 'Uthman asked again after the Prophet got 'Abdullah ibn Sa'd's oath of allegiance. The latter subsequently became governor of Egypt during the caliphate of 'Umar and 'Uthman, playing a significant part in the conquest of Africa.

2. 'Abdullah ibn Khatal, who had previously accepted Islam and been sent by the Prophet to collect alms tax. A servant and one of the Ansar went along with him. Coming to a halt in their journey, 'Abdullah ibn Khatal told the slave to prepare a chicken for a meal, but the slave went to sleep instead and could not prepare the food in time. 'Abdullah ibn Khatal became angry and killed the servant. Fearing that if he returned to Madinah, the Prophet would exact retribution for the servant's death, he reneged and joined the infidels. A poet, he used to recite verses abusing the Prophet. On the day Makkah was conquered, he wrapped himself up in the curtain of the Ka'bah. When the Prophet was told, he ordered 'Abdullah ibn Khatal to be executed in that place. Abu Burzah and Sa'id ibn Harith executed him between the Black Stone and the Place of Abraham.
3. Fartana, was 'Abdullah ibn Khatal's slave-girl. She also used to recite poems abusing the Prophet. Her dances were a regular feature of the Quraysh's wine-drinking orgies. She was also executed along with her master.
4. Quraybah, also 'Abdullah ibn Khatal's servant, pursued the same profession as Fartana. Orders were given for her execution, but her request was granted when she came to the Prophet and sought asylum. She then became Muslim.

5. Huwayrith ibn Nafidh ibn Wahab, another poet who held Islam in great contempt, made his name from heaping opprobrium upon the Prophet. While 'Abbas ibn 'Abdul Muttalib and the Prophet's daughters Fatimah and Umm Kulthum were on their way from Makkah to Madinah, Huwayrith ibn Nandh followed them and stabbed their camel with a spear. The camel reared up, and the Prophet's daughters fell to the ground. Orders were given for his execution, carried out by 'Ali.
6. Miqyas ibn Subabah, Hisham ibn Subabah's brother. In the Dhu Qarad campaign, an Ansari killed Hisham by mistake. After this, Miqyas came to Madinah and accepted Islam. He asked the Prophet for compensation for his brother's death, and his request was granted. He stayed in Madinah for a few days, then killed the person responsible for his brother's death, escaped to Makkah and reneged. The Prophet ordered that he be put to death, and Numaylah ibn 'Abdullah Laythi slew him.
7. Sarah, a slave girl of 'Ikrimah ibn Abi Jahl, revelled in pouring scorn upon the Prophet. Permission was given for her to be put to death, but she came to the Prophet and sought asylum, which was granted her, and she accepted Islam. She remained alive until the caliphate of 'Umar.
- 8-9. Harith ibn Hisham and Zubayr ibn Abi Umayyah were also to be killed, but they took refuge in their relative's house, Umm Ham bint Abi Jahl. 'Ali followed them and swore that he would not let them live. Umm Ham blocked 'Ali's path and, locking the two fugitives in her house, went to see the Prophet. She told him, 'Ali sought to kill two people to whom she had given refuge. "Whomsoever you have granted refuge, we have also granted refuge, and whomsoever you have taken into your asylum, we have also given asylum," the Prophet told her. 'Ali was ordered to let them go, and he did so.

10. 'Ikrimah ibn Abu Jahl, following in his father's footsteps, was an uncompromising opponent of Islam. Seeing that he was sure to meet his end in Makkah, he fled to Yemen. His wife, Umm Bakim bint Barith, who had accepted Islam, appealed to the Prophet for asylum on behalf of her husband. Her request was granted, and she went to Yemen to collect 'Ikrimah. He returned with her and became Muslim at the hand of the Prophet. After his conversion, he made great personal and financial sacrifices for Islam, finally meeting his death at Ajnadin while fighting against apostates during the caliphate of Abu Bakr.
11. Habbar ibn al-Aswad, who had been responsible for the great persecution of the Muslims. When the Prophet's daughter Zaynab, wife of Abu'l 'As was on her way from Makkah to Madinah, he stabbed her camel's side with a spear. The camel went into a frenzy, and Zaynab fell. She was with a child at the time. Not only did she suffer a miscarriage, but the effects of the mishap remained with her for the rest of her life. Orders were given to kill him, but he came to the Prophet and pleaded for mercy. "Prophet of God," he said, "forgive my ignorance. Let me become a Muslim." The Prophet forgave him.

12. Wahshi ibn Harb, who had been responsible for the death of the Prophet's uncle Hamzah. Realizing that the Muslims would kill him if they touched him, he fled from Makkah to Ta'if. Later, he came before the Prophet in Madinah, sought forgiveness for his crime, and offered to accept Islam. The Prophet admitted him into the fold of Islam and forgave him. Then, he joined in the fight against the false prophet Musaylimah during the caliphate of Abu Bakr. He finally slew Musaylimah with the same weapon that had made a martyr of Hamzah.
13. Ka'b ibn Zuhayr, a famous poet who used to write poems abusing the Prophet. He fled from Makkah when the city was conquered, and his execution was ordered, but he came to Madinah, asked for forgiveness, and beseeched the Prophet to accept his allegiance. The Prophet did so, presenting Ka'b with his own shawl at the same time.
14. Harith ibn Talatil, a poet who used to pour scorn on the Prophet through the medium of his poetry. The Muslims were permitted to slay him, and 'Ali did so.
15. 'Abdullah ibn Zib'ari, yet another poet, used to express his contempt for the Prophet in verse. When the Prophet ordered him to be killed, he fled to Najran.

Later, he came to the Prophet, repented, and accepted Islam. The Prophet forgave him.

16. Hubayrah ibn Abi Wahab Makhzumi, also a poet, used to deride the Prophet's mission. He was also on the list of those to be executed. He fled to Najran, where he died an infidel.
17. Hind bint 'Utbah, the wife of Abu Sufyan. Her hatred of Islam was so great that she extracted Hamzah's heart in the battle of Uhud and masticated it. She was to be executed, but she came before the Prophet, sought forgiveness and accepted Islam. After the Prophet forgave her and admitted her into Islam, she broke all the idols in her house, saying: "Truly, you have misled us."

It is clear, then, that all the seventeen men and women who were sentenced to death after the conquest of Makkah were guilty of specific crimes. Yet whichever of them sought forgiveness or had someone plead on their behalf was forgiven. None of those who appealed for clemency was killed. Eleven of the seventeen sentenced to death were forgiven directly or through a mediator. Five people who made no plea for clemency were put to death. One fled from Makkah and died a natural death in a faraway land.

In the wake of the Conquest of Makkah, how did the Prophet forgive people guilty in the sight of God? When Fatimah, who belonged to the Banu Makhzum tribe, had committed a theft, her kith and kin feared that her hand would be amputated. They approached Usamah ibn Zayd who, they thought, being a close associate of the Prophet, would be in a position to ensure that their relative escaped punishment. Usamah came to the Prophet and pleaded for clemency on behalf of Fatimah Makhzumi. The Prophet was visibly upset when he heard Usamah's words. "Are you trying to persuade me about limits God has set down?" he asked. The Prophet then called people together and delivered an address. "By the power who controls my soul," he said, "if my daughter Fatimah were to steal, then I would certainly amputate her hand." Fatimah Makhzumi received her due punishment, after which she repented and became righteous and upright.<sup>157</sup>

This shows that no one can forgive wrongdoers when God has prescribed punishment. How did the Prophet forgive people magnanimously after the Conquest of Makkah? The reason was that there is a difference between war crimes and crimes committed under normal conditions. People cannot be accorded remission of punishment for the latter form of crime. Crimes committed during wartime, however, can be forgiven when the perpetrators renounce their antagonism and seek clemency. Crimes committed under normal conditions are nullified when God's punishment is meted out, while war crimes are neutralized through surrender and an appeal for mercy. The enemies of Islam in Arabia had committed the most heinous crimes against the Muslims. Even so, the Quran announced that what had gone before would be forgiven if they repented.<sup>158</sup> Furthermore, if the enemy sues for peace, peace should be made, even if there is a danger of the peace terms being broken.

If they incline to peace, make peace with them, and put your trust in God. Indeed He is the Hearing, the Knowing. Should they seek to deceive you, God is all-sufficient for you. He has made you strong with His help and rallied the faithful around you.<sup>159</sup>

One of those sentenced to death and subsequently forgiven was ‘Ikrimah ibn Abi Jahl. Along with his father, he had been an active opponent of Islam and had subjected the Prophet and his companions to all forms of persecution. Yet, when news came that ‘Ikrimah was coming to accept Islam, the Prophet told his companions not to insult ‘Ikrimah’s father “for abuse of the dead hurts the living.”

After the conquest of Makkah, magnanimity such as this turned Islam’s most implacable foes into staunch custodians of faith.

PART THREE

THE TERMINATION OF PROPHETHOOD

In the early years of the Prophet Muhammad's mission, a man who had come to Makkah on a pilgrimage was asked on his return to his country what was new in Makkah. "Muhammad has claimed prophethood," he answered, but the only person of any distinction who has become his follower is the son of Abu Qahafah (Abu Bakr). From this answer, one can tell what people thought of the Prophet in A.D. 610 when he commenced his mission. In those days, his opponents used to refer to him as a village lad, calling him Ibn Abi Kabshah, i.e. the son of his village foster parents, to deride him. But, on the other hand, those who preferred to be more polite would call him "a youth from the Quraysh."

This was how the Prophet was referred to in his lifetime. Now, centuries later, things have changed. The prophethood of Muhammad is no longer a controversial matter; it has become a fact. When one thinks of the Prophet Muhammad, a great historical personality springs to mind, one who has been a subject of discussion for generations over the last 1500 years. If this history were to be taken away from the Prophet of Islam, he would return to being "Ibn Abi Kabshah" in the eyes of men. Were this to happen, there is not a shadow of a doubt that the number of Muslims in the world today would be counted in scores rather than in hundreds of millions. It is challenging to recognize a prophet of God when he comes in the guise of 'Ibn Abi Kabshah'.

On the other hand, accepting one who has become an established historical personality is relatively easy. The Prophet of Islam has now secured what the Quran calls a "position of praise and glory."<sup>160</sup> Small wonder those who sing his praises run into thousands of millions.

This factor contributed more than anything to the denial of prophets by their people in previous ages. "This is just an ordinary person," people would say. "Up till now, we knew him by his common name. How did he become a prophet of God all of a sudden?" "Whenever a prophet comes among his people, this objection is raised, posing a severe impediment to the acceptance by a prophet's contemporaries of his teachings.

At the time of their emergence, all of the prophets were greeted with suspicion and scepticism. The psychological barrier preventing people from believing in one who, in their eyes, appeared like anyone else proved insurmountable for most people. When they failed to believe in the prophets, however, they were punished according to the law of God.

Now God decided to send a prophet who would break down this barrier. There would be no room for doubt about whether his claim to prophethood was genuine or the result of over-zealous ambition. He would take his place in history as a prophet of God. His name would stand out in the seas of time, like a beacon beckoning people to belief. There would be no difficulty for people in recognizing him as God's Prophet, believing in him, and winning a share in God's eternal blessings.

There are several traditions according to which the Prophet is reported as saying that his followers would be more numerous than any other prophet. This is another way of making the same point. After Muhammad, there would be no other prophet. Never again would his followers have to choose between belief and disbelief. They would continue to grow in number until the coming of the Last Day.

A look at Israelite history will help to illustrate this point. The Jews who lived in the time of Jesus believed in God's law, as revealed to Moses. Yet when a new prophet—Jesus, the son of Mary—arose amongst them, they denied him. They continued to believe in their historic prophet and refused to believe in the prophet of their day. Seven hundred years later, the Prophet of Arabia was sent to the world. By this time, the number of Christians worldwide had increased considerably. History, however, was to repeat itself. Christians were not prepared to believe in an Ishmaeli rather than an Israeli Prophet. Again they retained their faith in a historically established Prophet—Jesus—but did not believe in a contemporary one—Muhammad. Except for a few Christians who accepted Islam, those who had been believers in Jesus became disbelievers in his successor.

Thanks to the termination of prophethood, the followers of Muhammad will never again have to choose between an ancient Prophet and a modern one. Never again—at least in the present world—will they be forced to opt for the old or the new—something which occurs in the community of a historic Prophet when a contemporary Prophet visits them. The installation of the Prophet Muhammad on the pinnacle of history, on what the Quran calls “a position of praise and glory,”<sup>161</sup> contributes to his being “a mercy for all nations.”<sup>162</sup> Historically, the position of Muhammad as a Prophet of God cannot be questioned; that is the nature of his position of praise and glory in this world. On the Day of Resurrection, it will manifest as special divine favour being conferred upon him.

It would be a mistake to think that the Prophet Muhammad’s elevation to such a position was a simple matter of selection. On the contrary, it was to bring a revolution in human history. Therefore, only an individual of the highest moral calibre, only one able to perform unparalleled feats of self-sacrifice and steadfastness, would be considered fit to be chosen. For this task, the Lord saw fit to call upon Muhammad:

You who are wrapped up in your vestment arise and give warning. Magnify your Lord, cleanse your garments, and keep away from all pollution. Bestow no favours expecting a gain. Be patient, for your Lord’s sake.<sup>163</sup>

The great soul “wrapped up in his vestment” responded to the call and participated in the divine scheme with wholehearted dedication, although many were his trials and tribulations before the prophetic mission, which was to be a mercy for the whole world, reached completion. The coming of repeated prophets, one after the other, to the world had been a severe test for humanity. Now, this era had passed, and there would be one acknowledged Prophet for all time, enabling people to enter into the sphere of God’s mercy in an unending procession.

With God’s choice of Muhammad, prophethood was given historical credibility. This meant that no more prophets had to come to the world in future. But it was not merely a matter of divine proclamation. Certain conditions had to be fulfilled before this could happen. Firstly, God’s commandments relating to every walk of human life had to be revealed. This was duly accomplished as the Quran states: “It is He who has revealed the Quran for you fully explained.”<sup>164</sup> Secondly, a perfect pattern had to be presented before humanity. The Prophet Muhammad provided humanity with just such a “good example,”<sup>165</sup> and this condition was fulfilled. Thirdly, there had to be an arrangement for the permanent preservation of the Quran. This task Almighty God took upon Himself: “It was We who revealed Quran, and We will certainly preserve it.”<sup>166</sup>

stone unturned in discharging their duty to communicate the word of God to their people. In the process, they proved that God had sent them by performing wondrous acts. If people did not believe despite all this, then there was no more that the prophets could do. It was now time for God's angels to take action, bringing down punishment on the disbelievers.

With the final Prophet, however, it was decided that the people he addressed should not be subjected to this form of divine punishment. Instead, the Prophet and his companions were told that the Muslims would punish those who did not believe and attacked Islam.<sup>167</sup> In other words, the task which used to be performed by angels would be accomplished by the hands of men.

It was due to this divine verdict that even after emigration and after having fully communicated the word of God to them until there remained no rational ground for denial, yet, unlike the peoples in the times of the previous prophets, they were visited by no all-consuming manifestation of the wrath of God. Instead, the Prophet and his companions were made to confront them on the battlefield. God's succour assisted the believers against their foes, and they emerged victorious. So it was that God's religion was established on the Arabian Peninsula in the form of a State.

It is God's way of revealing His commandments in the context of relevant circumstances. Since the religion the Prophet left to the world had to be complete in every detail, so had his mission to pass through every walk of human life. Only then would a correct pattern of life dealing with matters of both individual and general concern be established for coming generations. As Muslims continued to engage themselves in defuse against non-Muslims who refused to believe and attacked them, the granting of God's revelation was nearing completion. Commandments relating to different situations were being revealed, not all simultaneously, but gradually, in accordance with the prevailing conditions. The decision to have disbelievers punished at the hands of Muslims rather than by angels thus played an essential part in the completion of Shari'ah, for only if the Prophet were made to face every form of human situation would he be able to display every facet of the Islamic way of life. The course that events themselves took enabled the Prophet to show how to live at home and conduct oneself on the battlefield and in a position of power. The model he left for coming generations covers every walk of life and stands preserved until the coming of the Last Day.

The provision that God made for the termination of prophethood also produced circumstances conducive to preserving the Quran, the revealed word of God. If previous scriptures had not been preserved in their original form, no protective power would have emerged to support them. But the Prophet and his companions fought against their adversaries and established Islamic rule in a substantial portion of the globe so that the Book of God enjoyed state protection, its immunity from all attempts to change or destroy it is thus ensured. The Quran was preserved for one thousand years in this way, with one generation passing it on to the next under the protective wing of an Islamic government. Then humanity entered the age of the printing press, and there was no further danger of the Quran being destroyed.

It would be a mistake to think that all this was accomplished smoothly. To establish Islam as the ruling religion, thus ensuring the preservation of the Book of God, the Prophet and his companions had to suffer torments of unbearable intensity. The pagans wanted to see miracles. The Prophet, too, would have liked to have been able to produce miraculous signs of his prophethood. But it was not to be. Instead, the Prophet's character and demeanour had to replace miracles. The Prophet's opponents were not visited by any celestial or terrestrial punishment from God, as had been the case with those who denied the prophets of old. Instead, the Prophet and his companions had themselves to do what earthquakes and volcanoes had previously been used for—punish the disbelievers. The Book of God was not revealed all at once; the period of revelation extended over twenty-three years. During this time, the Muslims, under the leadership of the Prophet, had to cross all the deep rivers and climb every high mountain of life so that the path God desired His servants to follow could be fully mapped out.

The trials the Prophet and his companions underwent during this period reached a height of intensity called in the Quran “a tremendous shaking.”<sup>168</sup> The Prophet was given the arduous directive not to compromise with his oppressors.<sup>169</sup> However difficult the circumstances, he and his companions were given no leave to “stay behind”<sup>170</sup> in the face of the call of God. Were the Prophet’s wives to demand as much as two meals a day, they were given the notice to choose between “this life and all its finery” on the one hand or God and His Messenger on the other.<sup>171</sup>

Establishing the prophethood, which would become a subject of “praise and glory”, was the most hazardous project in the entire annals of human history. Even the Prophet was forced to admit that he had been persecuted “as no other Prophet” had been. In the words of his wife ‘Aisha, he was “shattered” by the treatment meted out to him despite him and his companions having denied themselves the comforts, even the necessities of life, to make the prophethood of Muhammad “a mercy for all nations.”

This is the great favour the Prophet Muhammad bestowed upon the human race. Because of it, his followers have been called upon to invoke peace and blessings upon him until the end of time. His family and companions are also included in this invocation, for they stood by the Prophet through thick and thin, remaining with him throughout the most gruelling afflictions. It is only natural that those who acknowledge the favour of the Prophet of Islam should express their gratitude to him. The peace and blessings, which Muslims invoke upon their Prophet, are an expression of their gratitude in the form of prayer. As the Prophet said: "Miserly is the one who hears mention of my name and does not invoke peace and blessing upon me."<sup>172</sup>

THE QURAN—THE MIRACLE GIVEN TO THE PROPHET

Every Prophet is given a miracle—a sign. The miracle of the Prophet of Islam is the Quran. The prophethood of Muhammad was to be valid until the Last Day. It was imperative, therefore, that his miracle also be one which would last for all time. The Quran was, therefore, assigned to the Prophet as his everlasting miracle.

The Prophet's opponents demanded miracles, such as those performed by previous prophets, but the Quran stated clearly that such miracles would not be forthcoming.<sup>173</sup> The Quran even had this to say to the Prophet:

If you find their aversion hard to bear (and would like to show them a miracle), seek a burrow in the earth or a ladder to the sky by which you may bring them a sign. Had God pleased, He would have guided them, one and all. Do not be one of the ignorants.<sup>174</sup>

Instead, the revealed Book of God was made into Prophet's miracle:

They ask: "Why has his Lord given no sign to him?" Say: "Signs are in the hands of God. My mission is only to give plain warning." Is it not enough for them that We have revealed to you the Book which is recited to them? Indeed, there is a blessing and an admonition to true believers.<sup>175</sup>

There are many different aspects of the Quran's miraculous nature. However, here we are going to concentrate on just three:

- I. The language of the Quran—Arabic—has, unlike other international languages, remained a living form of communication over the ages.
2. The Quran is unique among divine scriptures in that its text has remained intact in its original form.
3. The Quran challenged its doubters to produce a book like it. But unfortunately, no one has been able to take up this challenge and produce anything comparable to the Book of God.

The languages in which all the ancient scriptures were revealed have been locked in history archives. The only exception is Arabic, the language of the Quran, which is still current in the world today. Millions of people still speak and write the language in which the Quran was revealed nearly 1500 years ago. This provides stunning proof of the miraculous nature of the Quran, for there is no other book in history which has been able to impact its language; no other book has moulded a whole language according to its style and maintained it in that form over the centuries.

Take the Injil, known as the New Testament, of which the oldest extant copy is in Greek and not Aramaic, the language which Jesus is thought to have spoken. That means we only possess a translated account of what the Prophet Jesus said and did, and that too, in ancient Greek, which is considerably different from the modern language. By the end of the 19th century, the Greek language had changed so much that the meaning of at least 550 words in the New Testament—about 12% of the entire text—was challenged. At that time, a German expert, Adolf Deissman, discovered some ancient scrolls in Egypt. From them, it emerged that biblical Greek was, in fact, a colloquial version of classical Greek. This language was spoken in Palestine during the first century A.D. Deissman was able to attach meanings to some of the unknown words, but there are another fifty words whose meanings are still unknown.<sup>176</sup>

Ernest Renan (1823 - 1894) extensively researched Semitic languages. He wrote a book on their vocabularies, in which he had this to say about the Arabic language:

The Arabic language is the most wonderful event in human history. Unknown during the classical period, it suddenly emerged as a complete language. After this, it underwent no noticeable changes, so one cannot define it as an early or a late stage. It is just the same today as it was when it first appeared.<sup>177</sup>

In acknowledging this “astonishing event of human history”, Renan, a French orientalist, acknowledges the miraculous nature of the Quran. It was the Quran’s phenomenal literary style, which preserved the Arabic language from alteration, such as other languages, have undergone. The noted Christian writer Jurji Zaydan (1861-1914) is one of the scholars to have recognized this fact. In a book on Arabic literature, he writes:

No religious book has had such an impact on the language in which it was written as the Quran has had on Arabic literature.<sup>178</sup>

World languages have changed so much over the ages that no expert in any modern language can understand its ancient form without a dictionary. There have been two leading causes of language alteration—upheavals in a nation's social order and the development of a language's literature. Over the centuries, these factors have worked in Arabic, just as in other languages. The difference is that they have not been able to change the structure of the Arabic language. The Arabic spoken today is the same as that which was current in Makkah when the Quran was revealed. Homer's Iliad (850 B.C.), Tulsi Das' Ramayan (A.D. 1623), and the dramas of Shakespeare (1564-1616) are considered literary masterpieces of their respective languages. They have been read and performed continuously from their compilation until today. But they have been unable to keep the languages they were written from alteration. The Greek of Homer, the Sanskrit of Tulsi Das and even the English of Shakespeare are now classical rather than modern languages.

The Quran is the only book to have moulded a language in its form and maintained it in that form over the ages. There have been various intellectual and political upheavals in Arab countries, but the Arabic language had remained as it was when the Quran was revealed. No Arab social order has been altered in any way in the Arabic tongue. This fact indicates that the Quran came from a supernatural source. One does not have to look any further than the history of the last 1500 years to see the miraculous nature of the Book revealed to the Prophet Muhammad.

Social Upheavals

The example of Latin shows how social upheavals affect languages. Though Italy became the centre of Latin in the latter days, it was not originally a product of that country. Around the 12th century B.C., during the Iron Age, many central European tribes spread out into surrounding regions. Some of them, especially the Alpine tribes, entered Italy and settled in and around Rome. Their language mixed with the language of Rome, and that was how Latin was formed. In the third century B.C. Lubus Andronicus translated some Greek tales and dramas into Latin, thus making it a literary language. The Roman Empire was established in the first century B.C., and Latin became the official language. The spread of Christianity even further reinforced the strength of Latin. With the support of religious and political institutions and backed by social and economic forces, Latin continued to spread until it eventually came to cover almost the whole of ancient Europe. At the time of St. Augustine, Latin was at its peak, and right up to the Middle Ages, it was considered the primary international language.

The 8th century A.D. was an age of Muslim conquest. The Romans were forced to take refuge in Constantinople, which became the capital of the eastern half of the Empire, until in 1453, the Turks took Constantinople and banished the Romans from this, their last stronghold. The decline of the Roman Empire enabled various local languages to flourish, notably French, Italian, Spanish and Portuguese. Latin, the parent language, strongly influenced all of them but remained only as the official language of the Roman Catholic Church. No longer a living tongue, it retained only historical interest and continued to be used to explain technical, legal and scientific terms. For instance, without a good grasp of Latin, one cannot read Newton's Principia in the original.

Every classical language followed much the same pattern, changing along with social circumstances until, eventually, the original language gave way to another, completely changed one. Ethnic integration, political revolutions, and cultural clashes always left a deep mark on the language they affected. These factors have been at work in Arabic over the last 1500 years, but amazingly, it has remained intact. This extraordinary resilience of the Arabic language is entirely due to the miraculous spell the Quran has cast on it.

In A.D. 70, some Jewish tribes left Syria and settled in Madinah, where the Arabic-speaking 'Amaliqah tribe lived. Along with the 'Amaliqahs, the Jews took Arabic as their language, but the Arabic they spoke differed from standard Arabic, retaining a strong Hebrew influence. After the coming of Islam, Arabs settled in many parts of Africa and Asia where other languages besides Arabic were spoken. However, their intermingling with other races did not affect the Arabic language, which remained in its original state.

In the very first century, after the revelation of the Quran, Arabic was exposed to the sort of forces which cause a language to alter radically. This was when Islam spread among various Arab tribes, who began to congregate in major Muslim cities. There was a considerable variety of intonation and accents among the different Arab tribes. So much so that Abu 'Amr ibn al-'Ula' was moved to remark that the "Himyar tribe do not speak our language; their vocabulary is quite different from ours." 'Umar ibn al-Khattab once took before the Prophet an Arab he had heard reciting the Quran. The Arab had been pronouncing the words of the Quran in such a strange manner that 'Umar was unable to make out what part of the Book of God he was reading. The Prophet once spoke to a visiting delegation of some Arab tribe in their dialect. It seemed to 'Ali as if the Prophet was speaking in a foreign tongue.

The main reason for this difference was the variation in accent. For instance, the Banu Tamim, who lived in the eastern part of Najd, could not say the letter 'j' (jīm) and used to pronounce it as 'y' (Yē) instead. The word for a mosque (masjid), they used to pronounce 'masyid', and instead of shajarat (trees), they would say 'sharat'. 'Q'

(Qaaf) they pronounced as ‘j’, (je) calling a ‘tariq’ (road) a ‘tarij’, a ‘sadiq’ (friend) a ‘sadij’, ‘qadr’ (value) ‘jadr’ and ‘qasim’ (distributor) ‘jasim’. According to standard linguistic patterns, the coming together of tribes who spoke such varying dialects should have initiated a new process of change in Arabic, but this was not to be. The supreme eloquence of the language of the Quran guarded Arabic against any such transformation. What happened instead has been explained in the following words by Dr Ahmad Hasan Zayyat:

After the coming of Islam, the Arabic language did not remain the monopoly of one nation. It became the language of all those who entered the faith.<sup>179</sup>

Then these Arab Muslims left their native land, conquering territory from Kashghar in the east to Gibraltar in the west. Persian, Qibti, Berber, Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Aramaic and Suryani were among the languages spoken by the peoples they came into contact with. Some of these nations were politically and culturally more advanced than the Arabs. Iraq, the bastion of an ancient civilization and the cultural centre of major tribes, was one of the countries they entered. They mingled with the Iranians, masters of one of the world’s two great empires. The highly advanced Roman civilization and expanding Christian religion were two forces that clashed. Among the countries they occupied was Syria, where Phoenician, Ghassanid, Greek, Egyptian and Cana’anian tribes had left behind great traditions in literature and ethics. Then there was Egypt, the meeting place of oriental and occidental philosophy. These factors were enough to transform the Arabic language, as had been the case with other tongues exposed to similar forces. But they were rendered ineffective by the Quran, a specimen of such unrivalled literary excellence that no power could shake the language in which it had been written.

With the conquests of Islam, Arabic no longer belonged to one people alone; it became the language of several nations and races. When the “ajamis”<sup>180</sup> of Asia and Africa accepted Islam, they gradually adopted Arabic as their language. Naturally, these new converts were not as proficient in speaking the language as the Arabs of old. Then the Arabs, in their turn, were affected by the language spoken by their new co-religionists. The deterioration of Arabic was especially evident in large, cosmopolitan cities, where there was more intermingling of races. First, it was the rank and file, those who did not pay much attention to the finer points of linguistics, who were affected. But the cultural elite did not remain immune either. A man once came to the court of Ziyad ibn Umayyah and lamented. “Our fathers have died, leaving small children,” with both “fathers” and “children” in the wrong case. Mistakes of this nature became commonplace, yet the Arabic language remained essentially the same. Shielded by the Quran’s supreme eloquence, written Arabic was not corrupted by the degradation of the spoken version. It remained cast in the mould of the Quran.

To prove the Quran's miraculous nature, one has only to look at all the traumatic experiences that Arabic has been through over the last 1500 years. If it had not been for the protective wing of the Quran, the Arabic language would indeed have been altered. Yet, the unsurpassable model that the Quran established remained the immutable touchstone of standard Arabic.

Hijrah's fall of the Umayyad dynasty in the second century significantly threatened the Arabic language. The Umayyads had been a purely Arab dynasty. Strong supporters of Arab nationalism, they promoted Arabic literature and language almost to the point of partiality. Their capital was situated in Damascus, in the Arab heartland. In their time, both the military and the civil administration were controlled by Arabs.

Now the Abbasids took over the reins of power. Iranian support had brought the caliphate to the Abbasids. It was inevitable then that the Iranians should maintain a strong influence on their administration. This influence led to the capital being moved to Baghdad, on the threshold of Persia. The Abbasids gave the Iranians a free hand in government affairs but looked down on the Arabs and their civilization and made conscious efforts to weaken them, unlike the Umayyads, who had always preferred Arabs for high posts.

With the wane of pro-Arab favouritism, Iranians, Turks, Syrians, Byzantine and Berber elements could gain control over all affairs of society and state. Marriages between Arabs and non-Arabs became commonplace. With the mixing of Aryan and Semitic civilizations, the Arabic language and culture faced a new crisis. The grandsons of the emperors and lords of Persia arose to resurrect the civilization of their forefathers.

These events had a profound effect on the Arabic language. The state that it had reached by the time of the poet Mutanabbi (A.D. 915-965) is expressed in the following lines:

The buildings of Iran excel all others in beauty.
The season of spring excels over all other seasons.
An Arab youth goes amongst them, His face, hands, tongue, a stranger in their midst. They say Solomon used to converse with the jinns but were he to visit the Iranians; he would need a translator.<sup>181</sup>

The Quran's literary greatness alone kept Arabic from being permanently scarred by these upheavals. On the contrary, the language always returned to its Quranic base, like a ship which, after weathering temporary storms on the high seas, returns to the safety of its harbour.

During the reign of the caliph Mutawakkil (A.H. 207-247), large numbers of 'Ajamis—especially Iranians and Turks—entered Arab territory. Then, in 656, the Mongolian warrior Hulaku Khan sacked Baghdad. Later the Islamic empire received a further setback when, in 898, Andalusia fell to the Christians. The Fatimid dynasty, which had held sway in Egypt and Syria, did not last long either: in 923, they were replaced by the Ottoman Turks in large stretches of Arab territory. The centre of the Islamic government moved from Cairo to Constantinople; the official language became Turkish instead of Arabic, which continued to assimilate many foreign words and phrases.

The Arab world spent five hundred and fifty years under the banner of Ajami (non-Arab) kings. Persian, Turkish and Mughal rulers even attempted to erase all traces of the Arabic language. Arabic libraries were burnt, schools destroyed, and scholars of the language found themselves in disgrace. The Ottoman emperors launched an anti-Arabic campaign, fittingly called "Tatrik al-'Arab" (Turkisation of Arabs), by the well-known reformer Jamaluddin Afghani (1838-97). But no effort was strong enough to inflict any permanent scar on the face of Arabic. Fierce attacks were launched on the Arabic language and literature by the Tartars in Bukhara and Baghdad, the Crusaders in Palestine and Syria, and other Europeans in Andalusia. According to the history of other languages, these assaults on Arab culture should have been sufficient to eradicate the Arabic language. One would have expected Arabic to have followed the path of different languages and merged with other Semitic tongues. Indeed, it would be accurate to say that if Arabic had not come up against Turkish ignorance and Persian prejudice, it would be spoken throughout the Muslim world today. Still, its very survival in the Arab world was due solely to the miraculous effect of the Quran. The greatness of the Quran compelled people to remain attached to Arabic. It inspired some Arab scholars—Ibn Manzur (A.H. 630-711) and Ibn Khaldun (A.H. 732-808) being two that spring to mind—to produce, in defiance of the government of the day, works of outstanding literary and academic excellence.

Napoleon's entry into Cairo (1798) ushered in the age of the printing press in the Middle East. Education became the order of the day. The Arabic language was invested with new life. Yet the centuries of battering that Arabic had received were bound to leave its mark: instead of pure Arabic, a mixture of Arabic and Turkish had been taken as the official language in Egypt and Syria.

The situation changed again with the British occupation of Egypt in 1882. They opposed Arabic with all their strength, prescribing compulsory English in schools and eliminating other languages from syllabi. The French did the same in areas over which they had gained control. With the colonial powers forcing their subjects to learn their languages, Arabic lived in the shadow of English and French for over one hundred years. Yet it remained in its original form. Indeed, it assimilated new words—the word “dabbabah” meaning tank, for instance, which had previously been used for a simple battering ram. New styles of writing emerged. If anyone were to write a book about why people adopt Islam today, he might call it. “Li madha aslamna” (Why we accepted Islam?), whereas rhythmical and decorative titles, were preferred in the old days. Many words were adopted by the Arabic language—the English word “doctor”, for example. But such changes were just on the surface. Arabic proper remained the same as it had been centuries ago when the Quran was revealed.

Literary Advancement

Once in a while, writers of outstanding status appear on a language's literary scene. When this happens, the language they write changes, for their literary masterpieces influence the mode of popular expression. In this way, languages continually pass through progressive evolutionary stages until they become quite different from their original form. With Arabic, this did not happen. At the very outset of Arabic history, the Quran set a literary standard that could not be excelled. Arabic maintained the style set for it by the Quran. No masterpiece comparable to the Quran was destined to be produced after it, so Arabic remained cast in the mould of that divine symphony.

Take the example of English. In the 7th century A.D., it was just an ordinary local dialect, not geared to express profound intellectual thought. For another five hundred years, this situation continued. The Normans conquered England in 1066, and when the founding father of the English language—Geoffrey Chaucer—was born around 1340, the official language of their court was still French. Chaucer had command of Latin, French and Italian, besides his native English. This, along with his extraordinary gifts of scholarship, enabled him to make English into an academic language. To use Ernest Hauser's words, he gave the English language a “firm boost” with his Canterbury Tales. Chaucer transformed a dialect into a language, paving the way for fresh progress in times to come.

For two hundred years, English writers and poets followed Chaucer’s guidelines. Then, when William Shakespeare (1558-1625) appeared on the scene, English took another step forward. His dramas and poems set a new literary standard, enabling English to march further forward. The coming of the scientific age two hundred years later had a tremendous impact on every stratum of society. The language now began to follow the dictates of science. Prose became more popular than poetry, and factual expression was more effective than story-telling. Dozens of poets and writers, from Jonathan Swift (1667-1745) to T.S. Eliot (1888-1965), represented this trend. They were the makers of the modern age of English literature through which we are now passing.

The same thing happened with other languages. Writers, or groups of writers, kept on emerging and became more popular than their predecessors. Whenever they appeared, they steered the language on a new course. Eventually, every language changed so much that it became impossible for a person to understand the ancient form of his tongue without the aid of dictionaries and commentaries.

There is only one exception to this universal trend: Arabic. The claim of the Quran that no one would ever be able to write a book has been borne out to the letter. For further proof, one need only look at the various attempts to produce a work equal to the Quran made over the centuries. But, unfortunately, all attempts have failed dismally. Musaylimah ibn Habib, Tulayhah ibn Khuwaylid, Nadr ibn al-Harith, Ibn al-Rawandi, Abu'l 'Ala' al-Ma'rri, Ibn al-Muqaffa', Al-Mutanabbi, and many others, have tried their hand at it but their efforts, like Musaylimah's extraordinary reference to "God's blessing upon pregnant women, extracting from them a sprightly life, from between the stomach and the foetal membrane"<sup>182</sup> look ridiculous when compared with the literary majesty of the Quran.

But the greatest substantiation of the Quran's claim that no one can write a work like it<sup>183</sup> comes from what Ernest Renan has called the "linguistic miracle" of the Arabic language. As with every other language, masters of Arabic—great poets and writers—have appeared over the ages. But, in the 1500 years since the Quran was revealed, no one has been able to produce a work that excelled in the Quran. The standard that the Quran set has never been improved upon. Arabic has remained on the course that the Quran set for it. If the Quran had ever been bettered, Arabic would not have remained stable as it has. It would have received a new impetus and set a new course.

The Quran's impact on Arabic is like that of a writer who produces a work of unsurpassable literary excellence at the beginning of a language's history. After such a figure has made his mark, no lesser writer can change the face of the language. The Quran was revealed in the Arabic current then, casting it in a more elevated literary mould than had ever been seen before or afterwards.

By making vital additions to traditional modes of expression, the Quran opened the way for expanding the Arabic language. The use of the word “One” (ahad) in the 112th chapter of the Quran, entitled “The Unity,” is a good example. Previously it had been used in the genitive to express “one of us”, for example, or the “first day” of the week, Saturday or Yawm al-Ahad. It was used for general negations, as in maja’ni ahadun—“no one came to see me.” But in using ahad as an attribute of Almighty God, the Quran put the word to novel use. The Quran brought many foreign words into Arabic usage, for instance, istabraq from Persian, qaswarah from Abyssinian, sirat from Greek, yamm from Syrian, ghassaq from Turkish, qistas from Latin, malakut from Aramaic and kafur from Hindi. The Quran tells us (25:60) that the polytheists of Makkah were baffled at the word rahman. They used to say, “What is this rahman? This was because the word was not Arabic. It had been taken from the Sabaean and Hamiri languages. The Christians of Yemen and Abyssinia used to call God rahamnan. The Makkans considered the word foreign when it appeared in the Quran in an Arabicized form. They enquired what rahman meant, being unaware of its linguistic background. Over one hundred non-Arabic words were used in the Quran, taken from languages as far apart as Persian, Latin, Nabataean, Hebrew, Syrian, and Coptic.

Although the Quran was revealed mainly in the language of the Quraysh, words used by other Arab tribes were also included. ‘Abdullah ibn al-’Abbas, a Qurayshi Muslim, was puzzled when the word fatir appeared in the Quran. “I did not know what the expression ‘Originator of the heavens and the earth’ meant,” he explained. “Then I heard an Arab saying that he had ‘originated’ a well when he had just started digging it, and I knew what the word fatir meant.” Abu Hurayrah said that he had never heard the word sikkin until he heard it in the chapter, ‘Joseph’, of the Quran. “We always used to call a knife (mudiyah),” he said.

As Jalaluddin Suyuti has pointed out in al-Itqan, many words were pronounced differently by various Arab tribes. The Quran used some of these words in their most refined literary form. The Quraysh, for instance, used the word a’ata for ‘he gave,’ while the Himyaris used to pronounce it anta. The Quran preferred a’ata to anta. Likewise, it chose ‘asabi’ rather than shanatir and dhi’b instead of kata. The general trend of preferring Qurayshi forms was sometimes reversed, as in the phrase la yalitkum min a’malikum—“nothing will be taken away from your actions”—which was borrowed from the Banu ‘Abbas dialect.

In giving old Arabic words and expressions new depth and beauty, the Quran set a standard of literary excellence that no future writer could improve on. Moreover, it revised certain metaphors, rephrasing them more eloquently than had been heard before. This was how an ancient Arab poet described the impermanence of the world:

Even if he enjoys a long period of a secure life, every mother's son will finally be carried aloft in a coffin.

The Quran put the same idea in the poignantly succinct words: "Every soul shall taste death."<sup>184</sup> Killing and plundering presented a major problem in ancient Arabia. Specific phrases had been coined to express the idea that only killing could end the killing, and these were considered highly eloquent in pre-Islamic days. "To kill some is to give life to the whole," one of them went. "Kill more, so that there should be less killing" and "Killing puts an end to the killing" were other examples. The Quran said, "In [this law of] retribution there is life for you, O people of understanding."<sup>185</sup>

In pre-Quranic days, poetry was essential in Arabic and other world languages. Poetical expression of ideas was given pride of place in the literary arena. The Quran, however, left this beaten track and used prose instead of poetry. This in itself is proof that the Quran came from God, for in the 7th century A.D. who save God—who knows the future just as He knows the past—could know that prose rather than poetry should be chosen as the medium for divine scripture that was to last for all time. The Quran was addressed to future generations, and soon poetry would become less important as a mass communication medium. The rhetorical language was also very much in vogue before the Quran, but for the first time in literary history, the Quran introduced a factual rather than rhetorical style. The most famous topics for literary treatment had previously been military and romantic exploits. The Quran, on the contrary, featured a much broader spectrum, including matters of ethical, legal, scientific, psychological, economic, political and historical significance within its scope. In ancient times, parables were a popular mode of expression. Here too, the Quran trod new ground, adopting a more direct method of saying things. The reasoning employed in the Quran was also considerably different from that used in pre-Quranic times. Whereas purely theoretical, analogical proof was all the world had known before this, the Quran introduced empirical, scientific reasoning. And to crown all its achievements, the Quran expressed all this in a refined literary style, which proved imperishable in times to come.

There was an ancient Arab saying that “the sweetest poem was the one with the most lies.” The Quran changed this introducing a new mode of “articulate speech” (55:4) based on real facts rather than hypothetical fables. Now Arabic followed the Quran’s lead. Pre-Islamic Arabic literature was collected and compiled with the preservation and understanding of the language of the Quran in mind. Great departments of learning, facilitating knowledge of the Quran and explaining its orders and prohibitions, came into existence. Learning Arabic grammar, syntax and etymology, Islamic theology and traditions, and Quranic studies were all aimed at helping us understand the Quran's message. Even the subjects of history and geography were initially taken up as part of the Arabs' attempt to understand and practice the teachings of the Quran. There is no other example in the history of any book with such an enormous impact on people and their language.

The Quran became known as a superb literary masterpiece through its development and improvement of the Arabic language. Anyone who knows Arabic can see the unique quality of the Quran's style compared to any other work of Arabic literature. The Quran is written in a divine style different from anything humans can aspire to. We will close this chapter by relating a story that portrays the difference between God's work and men's. It is taken from Sheikh Tantawi's commentary of the Quran:

"On 13 June 1932," Tantawi writes, "I met an Egyptian writer, Kamel Keilany, who told me an amazing story. One day he was with an American orientalist, Finkle, with whom he enjoyed a deep intellectual relationship. "Tell me, are you still among those who consider the Quran a miracle?" whispered Finkle in Keilany's ear, adding a laugh to indicate his ridicule of such belief. He thought that Muslims could only hold this belief in blind faith. It could not be based on any sound, objective reasoning. Thinking that his blow had gone home,

Finkle was visibly pleased with himself. Seeing his attitude, Keilany, too, started laughing. “Before issuing any pronouncement on the style of the Quran,” he said, “We should first look and see if we can produce anything comparable. Only when we have tried our hand will we be able to say conclusively whether humans can produce anything comparable to the Quran?”

Keilany then invited Finkle to join him in putting a Quranic idea into Arabic words. The idea he chose was: that Hell is exceptionally vast. Finkle agreed, and both men sat down with pen and paper. Between them, they produced about twenty Arabic sentences. “Hell is extremely vast,” “Hell is vaster than you can imagine,” “Man’s intellect cannot fathom the vastness of Hell,” and many examples of this nature were some of the sentences they produced. They tried until they could think of no other sentence to express this idea. Keilany looked at Finkle triumphantly. “Now that we have done our best, we shall be able to see how the Quran stands above all work of men,” he said. “What, has the Quran expressed this idea more eloquently?” Finkle enquired. “We are like little children compared to the Quran,” Keilany told him. Amazed, Finkle asked what was in the Quran. Keilany recited this verse from Surah Qaf: “On the Day when We will ask Hell: ‘Are you full?’ And Hell will answer: ‘Are there any more?’”<sup>186</sup> Finkle was startled on hearing this verse; amazed at the supreme eloquence of the Quran, he openly admitted defeat, "You were right, quite right," he said, "I unreservedly concede defeat." "For you to acknowledge the truth," Keilany replied, "is nothing strange, for you are a man of letters, well aware of the importance of style in language." This particular orientalist was fluent in English, German, Hebrew and Arabic and had spent all his life studying the literature of these languages.<sup>187</sup>

THE COMPANIONS OF THE PROPHET

The Companions of the Prophet—the Sahabah—stand alongside him in history just as they stood alongside him during his lifetime, for they were the ones selected by God to assist His messenger. They joined him in seeing his divine mission through to its proper conclusion. As ‘Abdullah ibn Mas’ud said: “God chose them to accompany His Prophet and to establish his religion.”

Let us take a look at a few of the outstanding qualities of the Companions, which gave them their place in history.

Islam was Something They Loved

One of the qualities of the Companions described in the Quran was their attachment to the Faith.<sup>188</sup> Of this, love is the ultimate expression; it is the highest feeling we can have for something; it replaces all else in our thoughts. Our attitude towards the beloved is something instinctive. We know what to do and what not to do because the natural feeling has developed for the object of our love. Its joys and sorrows become our own. This was the intensity of feeling that the Companions had for Islam. They rejoiced in the success of their faith as a father rejoices when his son is flourishing. When Islam received a setback, they would not rest until they had redressed it.

When one associates oneself with a cause—as the Companions did with Islam—one needs no telling about what one's attitude should be. Heartfelt enthusiasm shows the way. One is willing to give everything for it and place its interest above all else. Our losses on its behalf become our gains, and there can be no feeling of diminishing our worth in the face of its claims. The difficulties we encounter in its espousal are easily surmounted because of the fervour with which we are imbued.

There was nothing extraordinary or supernatural about the Companions. They were human beings like any other. What made them stand out from the rest of humanity was that the feeling of true love, which most people feel only for themselves, was thought for the faith of Islam. They built for the future of Islam as normal people build for their futures. Just as people put all their energy and wealth into pursuing their interests, so did they put their all into pursuing Islamic interests. The depth of their attachment to Islam enabled them to establish the supremacy of the Faith.

Recognising the Prophet at the Very Beginning

One unique quality of the Companions was that they recognised a prophet who was their contemporary. It is very difficult to identify and believe in a prophet of one's day: this can be gauged from the fact that no group except for the Companions has ever managed to do so. At every stage of ancient history, prophets were denied and ridiculed when they appeared among their people. "You thought nothing of My prophets," the Bible says. Who were these people who "thought nothing" of the prophets? They were the very ones who believed in both prophecy and divine revelation. They had set up great institutions in the name of prophets. It was with great enthusiasm that they included days for the remembrance of various prophets in their calendar: But it was only ancient prophets whom they revered in this manner. As for the prophets of their day, they made them objects of ridicule and scorn.

The Jews disbelieved in the Prophet Jesus, even though they believed in Moses. Despite their veneration for Jesus, the Christians denied the Prophet, Muhammad. Even the Quraysh of Makkah prided themselves on being heirs of Abraham, but when the heir to Abraham's prophetic legacy came among them, they attacked him and expelled him from the land.

Why was there this discrepancy between people's treatment of ancient prophets on the one hand and contemporary prophets on the other? The reason was that the might of historical tradition supported ancient prophets. They become an essential part of a people's national heritage. People of later generations look back at prophets of old as sacred heroes—forgers of their national identity. Few will resist faith when there is so much added incentive to believe. With a contemporary prophet, however, the situation is quite different. His prophethood is still a controversial issue. A cloak of doubt surrounds his mission. To believe in him, one has to see through outward appearances. To follow him, one has to bury all thoughts of oneself. Doubt prevails over the truth of his mission. His prophethood has not yet received the verification of history. Under such conditions, believing in a prophet and actively participating in his mission is challenging. But it was this, no less, that the Companions could do: believe in a prophet of their day as if he were a prophet of ancient times.

During the Battle of the Trench (A.H. 5), Madinah was besieged by the Quraysh and all of the Arab clans who had entered into an alliance with them. The siege intensified until it became impossible for the Muslims to obtain even the necessities of life. At this time, one of the Muslims said in desperation: “Muhammad used to promise us that the treasures of Khusrau and Caesar would be ours, and now here we are—unable even to relieve ourselves in peace.” When this battle took place, the Prophet’s promise was just that—a promise; it was nowhere near fulfilment, although now it is a matter of ancient history. The Companions, nevertheless, acknowledged the Prophet’s greatness before his promises had become history. Those who recognise his greatness today do so after fulfilling his promises after history has put the stamp of greatness upon him. There is a world of difference between these two acknowledgements. One bears no comparison to the other. Today, even non-Muslim historians have been compelled to allot pride of place in human history to the Prophet Muhammad. But, during his lifetime, recognizing his greatness was extremely difficult, so much so that this could only be done by those whom God had granted special grace.

Adhering to the Quran When it was Still The Subject of Controversy

The Companions' way of preaching the faith was to take a revealed portion of the Quran and recite it to the people. For this reason, the Companions who went to Madinah to preach Islam were called muqris—reciters of the Quran. In a modern environment, this would be nothing extraordinary. But when one leaves aside the 1400 years of history between the Companions and us and imagines the conditions that prevailed in their time, their action appears in an entirely new perspective. At that time, it was a mammoth task to stand amongst the people and recite the Quran, one that no group except for the Companions had ever performed.

The picture that springs to mind with the mention of the word “Quran” today is that of a book that has, over 1400 years, established its greatness without the slightest shadow of a doubt. Millions of people the world over accept it as the Book of God. Expressing belief in the Quran has become a matter of personal pride. However, the Quran did not enjoy this status at the time of revelation. Many of the companions' contemporaries treated it as an object of derision. "We have heard them," said some speaking of the revelations. "If we wished, we could produce the like. They are nothing but fables of the ancients."<sup>189</sup> They say, 'It is just fables of the ancients, which he has had written down. They are dictated to him morning and evening.'<sup>190</sup>

To believe in the Quran under such circumstances was like seeing future events as if they had already happened. It required vision enabling one to see a concealed truth before it had become established in the eyes of men. Making the Quran, the basis of one's preaching mission must have been challenging. To do so amounted to a negation of personal greatness and the acceptance of the greatness of another—one whose greatness had not yet been accepted by the world. When the famous Arab poet Labid accepted Islam, he gave up writing poetry. When someone asked why he had done this, he replied, "What? After the Quran?" If a poet today were to relinquish his writing for the same reason, he would be accorded tremendous acclaim and widespread respect. In saying, "How can I write poetry after the advent of the Quran," he would be looking at a Quran with a glorious history behind it. Labid said these words at the very beginning of the Quran's account. There is no comparison between acknowledging the greatness of something after history has cast a mantle of greatness upon it and doing so beforehand. The Quran has explained the difference in these words:

Those of you who spent and fought before the victory will be higher in rank than those who spent and fought afterwards.<sup>191</sup>

Spending One's Wealth for the Sake of a Truth which has Yet to be Established

The following incident has been related to Ibn Abi Hatim under the authority of 'Abdullah ibn Mas'ud. When the verse of the Quran—"Who will offer God a generous loan? He will double it for him and give him a rich reward."<sup>192</sup>—was revealed, Abu Dahdah of the Ansar asked the Prophet if God wanted them to "lend Him a loan," The Prophet replied in the affirmative. "Give me your hand," Abu Dahdah said to the Prophet. The Prophet put his hand in Abu Dahdah's as the latter told him he would lend his whole orchard—six hundred date palms—to his Lord. His wife, Umm Dahdah, was then in the orchard with her children. Abu Dahdah came and told her to leave it, for he had donated it to the Lord on High. "What a good deal you have made!" Umm Dahdah exclaimed, immediately taking her children and belongings out of the orchard. "How many trees—luxuriant and laden with fruit—will Abu Dahda have in paradise," the Prophet said of this donation.

This incident is representative of a general eagerness among the Companions to donate their wealth for the sake of their faith. One must call to mind once again that this happened 1400 years ago. Were anyone to perform an act of similar charity in the name of their religion today, it is quite possible that they would have great honours conferred upon them by Muslims, which far exceeded their expenditure. But things were quite different in the time of the Companions. To spend in the cause of religion in those days was to be condemned as insane by society. Far from raising one to a high pinnacle of fame, it was like burying oneself in self-oblivion. The cause to which the Companions devoted their lives and properties was surrounded by doubt. Historical evidence had not yet accumulated in support of it. The truth of Islam had not yet been established in society at large. Yet the Companions donated their wealth for the sake of their religion at that uncertain period of Islamic history: Now, 1400 years later, the greatness of Islam has become an established fact, supported by centuries of history. Spending on a cause that has not consolidated its place in society is very different

Placing One's Crown on the Head of Another

Before the Prophet emigrated to Madinah, 'Abdullah ibn Ubayy had stood out as a natural leader in that city. His character, charisma and intelligence-led the people of Madinah to choose him as their king. They considered him the right person to end the civil strife and conflict which had raged among them for so long. A ceremony was planned at which ‘Abdullah ibn Ubayy was to be crowned king of Madinah.

Arrangements for ‘Abdullah ibn Ubayy’s coronation had been completed when Islam first came to Madinah. The people of Madinah took naturally to the new religion, and Islam won followers in every home. A delegation travelled to Makkah, where they met the Prophet and heard the teachings of Islam from his lips. The impression that they received was that the person they needed to reign over their society was—not ‘Abdullah ibn Ubayy—but the Prophet Muhammad. On behalf of the people of Madinah, they asked the Prophet to come to their town and take over as their leader. They swore allegiance to the Prophet at ‘Aqabah, an event that proved a watershed in Islamic history.

Apart from its far-reaching historical implications, this act of allegiance was an extraordinary feat. It was as if the people of Madinah were taking the crown off their head and placing it on that of a stranger. People have always been highly reluctant to take someone from outside their nation or tribe as a leader. Such a move was unheard of in ancient Arabia. It was even more difficult in this case because the “Muhammad” they were taking in was not the great historical personality we know today. He was a person whom his people had expelled. Not only was he a controversial figure, but he was also a homeless, destitute one. The people of Madinah were giving him everything, promising nothing in return. In the 20th century, we heard some western thinkers—notably Bernard Shaw—mention what an exemplary leader of the western world a person like Muhammad would make. To make an offer like this in the 6th century, however, was a very different matter, for at that time, the unique qualities of leadership that the Prophet possessed had not become engraved on the pages of history.

Realizing our limitations

The Prophet Muhammad used to confer with his Companions over every matter that arose. After explaining the situation, he would ask them for their opinion. Though he appeared to be consulting with everyone, what used to happen was that there would be silence for a while, and then Abu Bakr would get up and briefly offer his opinion. ‘Umar would do the same, and a handful of others followed suit before a unanimous decision was reached. Consultations followed the same pattern during Abu Bakr’s term as Caliph. ‘Umar would be the first to speak, and then a few others would give their opinion. Finally, the final decision would have everyone’s agreement. Only during ‘Umar’s caliphate, when the number of Muslims who had not seen the Prophet increased, alternations took place in the consultation process.

This may appear to be a simple matter, but it is significant. It shows the companions' humility and awareness of their shortcomings and limitations. Such a procedure can be followed only by those humble enough to acknowledge another's worth at their own expense. One unique quality of the Companions was that they looked objectively at themselves like ordinary people would look only at others.

One must remember that Abu Bakr and 'Umar, of whom we speak, were not the historical personalities we know today. It was vastly more challenging to recognize the worth of Abu Bakr and 'Umar than it is now. The two men had then still to be appreciated when history was in its formative stage, whereas in the present day, we are in a position to evaluate them with historical hindsight. For the companions, they were just two of their number; for us, they have become two mighty pillars standing out in the landscape of history. For us to fail to acknowledge Abu Bakr and 'Umar would defy history. For the Companions to acknowledge these two amounted to the abnegation of their selves—an infinitely more difficult task, which the Companions accomplished in exemplary fashion.

Taking Responsibility Upon Oneself

Dhat al-Salasil was a place in the Syrian desert occupied by the Ghassanid and Kalb tribes, to which the Prophet sent an expedition under the leadership of 'Amr ibn al-'As. However, when the latter reached there and saw the preparations being made by the enemy, he realized that his force was too weak to battle with them. So he set up camp and sent a message to the Prophet asking for reinforcements. The Prophet then prepared an additional force of 200 Muhajirs, which was despatched under the leadership of Abu ‘Ubaydah ibn al-Jarrah.

When Abu ‘Ubaydah’s force joined with that of ‘Amr ibn al-’As, the question arose about who would be the leader of the combined army. ‘Amr ibn al-’As was in no doubt that he should be, as the reinforcements had been sent at his request. However, Abu ‘Ubaydah’s companions disagreed. They thought that Abu ‘Ubaydah should be the leader of the whole army, or otherwise, the division should remain under separate command. When the quarrel escalated, Abu ‘Ubaydah addressed ‘Amr, telling him that the final promise the Prophet had taken from him was that they should agree and work in unity. “Even if you disobey me,” he said, “I promise to obey you.”

Had Abu ‘Ubaydah so desired, he could have remained obdurate and left it to Amr to give way. Substantial arguments in support of his position could have been found. But he eschewed such a course and took it upon himself to end the dispute unilaterally. In community life, people must be able to do this. Only when people are magnanimous enough to accept their responsibilities instead of arguing about their rights can a community function harmoniously.

It requires exceptional courage to do this, but there is no other way of preserving unity in a society.

Not Bearing Grudges

Khalid ibn al-Walid was a courageous and able soldier who remained commander of the Muslim army in Syria from the time of the Prophet right throughout the caliphate of Abu Bakr. However, ‘Umar disapproved of some of Khalid’s habits and asked Abu Bakr to remove him from his command. Abu Bakr did not act on ‘Umar’s advice, but ‘Umar was so set in his opinion that, on becoming Caliph, he dismissed Khalid. As a result, the Muslim army commander was demoted to the rank of an ordinary soldier.

When the order came, Khalid lay all low before him as the Muslims’ triumphant march through Syria continued. Then, suddenly came the news of his dismissal and the appointment of Abu ‘Ubaydah ibn al-Jarrah in his place. The news shocked Khalid’s army, and soldiers gathered in their leader’s tent. They assured him of their support and urged him to defy the Caliph’s orders. Khalid sent them away, telling them that he did not fight for ‘Umar’s cause; he fought for the cause of ‘Umar’s Lord. Before, he had fought as commander; now, he would fight as an ordinary soldier.

Only a person who rises above grudges and rancour can act in this manner—one who has a positive attitude to life and refrains from reacting adversely. Khalid's words show how deeply involved he was in doing the will of God. So much so that he took 'Umar's decision entirely in his stride.

Doing More Than One is Legally Bound To

In the month of Sha'ban A.H. 6, the Prophet received news that a force of 1000 men had gathered under the leaders of the Quraysh and was advancing on Madinah. Six hundred were armoured, and an elite cavalry unit consisted of one hundred men. Tension was running high in Madinah as the Prophet called a meeting of the Muhajirs and the Ansar to ask them what should be done. As usually happened on such occasions, senior members of the Muhajirs rose to offer their opinion. "Prophet of God," they said, go ahead and do whatever your Lord commands. We will stand by you. We will not tell you to go and fight along with your Lord while we stay sitting here, as the Jews did before us.<sup>193</sup> Rather we say unto you: go and fight with your Lord; we will fight alongside you. We will not desert you as long as at least one of us has life in his body."

Yet despite such assurances from the Muhajirs, the Prophet kept telling people what he should do. Finally, Sa'd ibn Mu'adh, one of the Ansar, arose. "Perhaps we figure in your thoughts," he told the Prophet. The Prophet said that they did. Then Sa'd ibn Mu'adh, on behalf of his fellow Ansars, reassured the Prophet with these words: "We have believed in you and acknowledged you as God's prophet. We have testified to the truth of your teachings. We have solemnly promised to listen to you and obey whatever you say. So do whatever you deem fit, Prophet of God. We will stand by you. We swear by the one who has sent you with the truth; even if you take us to the shores of the sea and plunge us into its waters, we too will follow you. Not one of us will stay behind. We have no qualms about joining you to do battle with the enemy tomorrow. We are resolute on the battlefield, true to our word in times of conflict. Perhaps God will enable us to prove ourselves in a manner which will be pleasing to you. So take us with you, trusting in the grace of God.” When Sa’d ibn Mu’adh had his say, a final decision was taken to advance to meet the enemy.

During the Battle of Badr (A.H. 3), the Prophet kept looking towards the Ansar. Ibn Hisham has explained the background of his concern. “When the Ansar entered into the second oath of allegiance at ‘Aqaba’, he writes,” they were not bound by their oath to accept the responsibility for his safety outside Madinah. ‘While you are in our country,’ they said, ‘we will defend you as we defend our wives and children.’ This was all very well, but the Prophet was afraid that the Ansar would consider themselves obliged to assist him only if the enemy entered Madinah and would not feel themselves under any obligation to fight an enemy outside the precincts of the city.’

True, although the Ansar had entered into a defence pact at ‘Aqabah, according to its terms, they were not strictly bound to fight in Badr, 80 miles from Madinah. But Ansar did not use this as an excuse. On the contrary, it redounds to their credit that they went far and beyond the strict terms of their agreement and, along with the Prophet, offered their life's blood on the field of Badr.

Avoiding Controversy and Concentrating on One's Basic Goal

The historian Tabarani tells us on the authority of Masar ibn Makhramah, of how, on one occasion, the Prophet addressed the Companions with these words: "God has sent me as a mercy for all, so pass on what you have heard from me. God will make manifest His mercy. And do not quarrel with one another, as the disciples quarrelled over Jesus, the son of Mary. He called on them to perform the same mission I am entrusting to you now. But those who lived far away did not like the idea and asked not to go, and Jesus remonstrated with his Lord over this matter." "We will pass on your message," the Companions assured him in response. "Send us wherever you please."

Internal friction is the most significant thorn in the side of a community, preventing its members from pursuing a constructive course of action. The Companions did not let themselves sink into the quagmire of petty controversies. Fear of God had imbued them with a profound sense of responsibility. They concentrated on discharging these responsibilities and had no time for quarrels, which would have prevented them from doing so. Even during the Prophet's lifetime, they had taken Islam to the borders of the Arabian Peninsula. After his demise, they continued to act as if at his behest. Blind to all thoughts of self—aggrandisement, they dispersed in the neighbouring lands. Their homes were just like small schools, in which they imparted to people knowledge of the Arabic language, the Quran, and the Prophet's Sunnah. In this way, they passed on what they had heard from the Prophet. This was a time of great Islamic conquests, and a particular portion of the Muslim community had to shoulder the political responsibilities of an expanding empire. The Companions might have been expected to take their share in the political glory, but they showed no inclination for such things. Instead, most of them used the atmosphere created by the conquests of Islam to further their preaching mission. It was their and their disciples' steady, unobtrusive efforts that created—within fifty years—the vast expanse of the territory now known as the Arab world. They changed the religion of people spread over three continents and brought them a new language and culture.

Being Content to Remain in Obscurity

The first matter that had to be settled after the Prophet's death was the election of a Caliph. The Ansar put forward their candidate—Saad ibn 'Ubadah. When the Muhajirs learnt of Ansar's proposal, they hurried to the Thaqifah (shed) of the Banu Sa'dah, where the Ansar were gathered. Abu Bakr addressed them. "There is no doubt that you are indeed endowed with the qualities you have mentioned. But as for leadership of the Arab people, it is to the Quraysh we must look for that. Geographically and ethnically, they occupy a central place in Arab life. Therefore, I will propose to you two names 'Umar and Abu 'Ubaydah ibn al-Jarrah, swear allegiance to whomsoever of them you, please.

'Umar arose after this and immediately swore allegiance to Abu Bakr as Caliph. The Ansar followed his lead, but some took it so hard that they told the Muhajirs that it was as good as killing Sa'd ibn 'Ubadah.

The Ansar had made enormous sacrifices for the cause of Islam. They had given shelter to the stranded ship of Islam when it had been forced to leave its waters. Yet despite their sacrifices, they agreed to make another one. They disowned a share in power and united behind a Qurayshi caliph. There was a good reason for the appointment. The Quraysh, to which clan the Muhajirs belonged, had been considered leaders of Arabia for centuries. A leader from any other tribe would not have commanded the support needed to administrate a burgeoning empire. The Ansar were realistic enough to acknowledge their shortcomings in this respect and accept the Muhajirs' unilateral decision. It is hard to find a comparable example of such selfless realism in the history of the world.

Rational Decisions, During Emotional Crises

The Battle of Uhud (A.H. 4) was the severest in Islamic history. All the warriors of the Quraysh, thirsty for revenge after their defeat at Badr, descended on the Muslims. Just when the fighting was fiercest, the Prophet drew his sword and asked his companions which one would take it and exact its full worth. The Prophet did not give the sword to the first few who volunteered. Then Abu Dujanah came forward and asked the prophet what the full worth of the sword was. "That you should strike the enemy with it until it bends," the Prophet replied. "That is how I shall wield it," Abu Dujanah said as he offered to take the sword. The Prophet gave it to him. Abu Dujanah's pride was visible as he strode off with the sword. "Such strutting cannot be pleasing to God," said the Prophet, "But the occasion excuses it." Abu Dujanah tied a red cloth around his head, signalling his readiness to fight. He conducted himself with incredible bravery, striking all who came before him. Then an astonishing incident occurred, later described by Abu Dujanah himself, "I saw someone inciting the enemy in a particularly violent way. I rushed towards him and raised my sword to kill him. The person screamed, and I saw that it was a woman. So I refrained from debasing the Prophet's sword by slaying a woman with it".

Another companion has described the incident like this. "I saw that Abu Dujanah had raised his sword to kill Hind bint ‘Utbah. Suddenly he removed the sword from above her head.” One of the orders the Prophet issued in times of battle was that women, children and older men should not be slain. Abu Dujanah remembered the Prophet’s orders in the heat of the battle, and even as his sword was plunging into its victim, he withdrew it when he saw that it was a woman.

From this, one can see how strong the Companions’ control over their emotions was. Even in moments of overwhelming passion, they could take reasoned decisions and judge matters dispassionately, no matter how extreme the provocation they faced. Even when feelings of anger and vengeance had gone beyond all bounds, they could adopt the correct frame of mind. Changing direction when travelling at full speed may appear easy enough, but it is challenging in practice. Only one can accomplish such a task, who goes so in fear of God that it is as if God were standing before him in all His power and glory.

Growing Like a Tree

The Quran refers to both the Torah and the Injil (The Old and New Testaments) to describe two qualities of the Companions. Quotations from the Torah explain their individual qualities, while the Injil illustrates their qualities as members of their community:

Thus they are described in the Torah and the Gospel: like the seed which puts forth its shoot and strengthens it, so that it rises stout and firm upon its stalk, delighting the sowers. Through them, God seeks to enrage the unbelievers. God has promised forgiveness and a rich reward for those who will believe and do good works.<sup>194</sup>

The simile is presented like this in the New Testament:

And he said, So is the kingdom of God as if a man should cast seed into the ground;

And should sleep, and rise night and day, and the seed should spring and grow up, he knoweth not how. For the earth bringeth fruit of herself; first the blade, then the ear, and then the whole corn in the ear.

But when the fruit is brought forth, immediately he putteth in the sickle because the harvest comes. And he said, Whereunto shall we liken the kingdom of God? or with what comparison shall we compare it?

It is like a grain of mustard seed, which, when it is sown in the earth, is less than all the seeds that be in the earth:

But when it is sown, it groweth up, becometh greater than all herbs, and shooteth out great branches; so that the air's fowls may lodge under its shadow.<sup>195</sup>

This parable in both the Quran and the Bible tells how the social evolution of the Companions of the Prophet would be like that of a tree. Starting as a tiny seed, the pillar of their society would develop as a tree trunk, gradually consolidating its roots in the ground and stretching its branches out in the air. They would grow slowly in natural stages, finally reaching a peak. Their splendid development would cause gratification to men of faith and frustration to enemies.

The Companions of the Prophet were chosen to fulfil Almighty God's wish that Islam should thrive like a tree. The fact that God wished it did not mean the task would be easy. They were required to eschew the easy, quick way of doing things and follow the path of patience. They had to bury their desires and personal preferences, always giving precedence to the will of God. The Companions had to give everything to bring the tree of Islam into existence, not caring for any return in this world. They had to involve themselves unconditionally in God's scheme. As a result of their effort, Islam grew into a permanently flourishing garden that no power in the world could destroy.

PART FOUR

MANIFESTATION OF PROPHETHOOD IN THE PRESENT DAY AND AGE

God decreed that the final prophet, Muhammad, should establish the dominance of true religion over all other religions.<sup>196</sup> This particular task entrusted to the Prophet of Islam has also been assigned to his followers. The dominance of religion that Muhammad brought about was the culmination of a grand divine scheme, with the groundwork laid over the previous 2,500 years. All the Prophet had to do was bring it to completion. So it has been with the Prophet's ummah —his community. Over the last 1000 years, the ground has been prepared for the re-establishment of the dominance of true religion. If the followers of Muhammad make wise and conscientious use of the opportunities available to them, the mantle of God's succour will indeed fall on them as it fell upon the Prophet. That is the promise of God.

The article "Man and His Gods," in the Encyclopaedia Britannica, tells of the Islamic revolution brought about by the Prophet Muhammad as having "changed the course of human history."<sup>197</sup> The Christian orientalist author has no choice but to acknowledge Islam's unique historical impact.

What Islam brought about was no less than the spiritual liberation of humanity. Without the burden of superstition and polytheism weighing them down, people could advance in every walk of life. Themselves products of the Islamic revolution, these advances can once again be used to the benefit of Islam. The conditions are perfect for a revival of Islamic dominance. It could become a reality as easily as growing a healthy crop from moistened, fertile soil.

The revolution the Prophet and his companions brought about was spiritual, solidly based on belief in one God and the hereafter. Yet there were far-reaching worldly repercussions as well. Preaching true religion became considerably easier than it had been in the past. Major obstacles which had stood in the path of one who called humanity to God were submerged in a wave of significant social change.

When the surah of the Quran entitled "Repentance" was revealed, the Prophet sent 'Ali to Makkah with the message that no polytheist would be allowed to perform Hajj in future. With such force and persistence, he proclaimed that his voice became hoarse. Nowadays, he could have done the same thing much more efficiently with a loudspeaker. Of course, this is just a simple example, but it illustrates how modern facilities can be utilized to proclaim the truth.

There have been two main eras in the preaching of true religion, the first before the mission of the Final Prophet and the second afterwards. Before Muhammad's coming, the onus of preserving the divine scriptures had been put upon the followers of prophets. In the words of the Quran, they had been “required to guard the Book of God.”<sup>198</sup> With the Quran, however, God has made it plain that “it was We who revealed the Quran, and We will certainly preserve it.”<sup>199</sup>

It was God’s will that, with the mission of the Prophet of Islam, polytheism should be vanquished and monotheism reign supreme in the world.<sup>200</sup> Only He can bring about circumstances conducive to such a transformation in human thought. So it was that, over the 2,500 years preceding the coming of Muhammad, the groundwork for the Islamic revolution had been laid. It was for the Prophet Muhammad to work on this foundation and bring about the domination of monotheism over polytheism.

The Islamic revolution of the Prophet’s time forever vanquished polytheism. Through the work of the Prophet and his companions, the possibility vanished of polytheism ever-again ruling the world. Yet, monotheistic thought has again forfeited its dominance in the present age. In today’s world, atheistic thought holds pride in place, and monotheism has been relegated to a position of secondary importance.

God, indeed had full knowledge of the fact that atheism was going to rear its head in the world. Accordingly, He sent down His succour, preparing global conditions to counter atheism and re-establish the dominance of monotheistic thought. This process has been continuing for the last one thousand years. Now it has reached its climax. Though atheism still holds sway in the world, the conditions are perfect for reasserting the supremacy of monotheistic thought.

Nearly 4000 years ago, the Prophet Abraham preached the word of God in Ur, the capital of ancient Iraq. He impressed people that God was the sole controller of loss and gain. He has no partner. From Him should one seek help, and He alone is worthy of worship. Unfortunately, this message of monotheism proved too much for the reigning king, Nimrod, to bear. So violent was his reaction to Abraham's preaching that he ordered God's prophet to be burnt at the stake, a fate from which he was saved by divine intervention. Though there is still polytheism in the world today, no modern ruler would react so violently to the message of Abraham were it to be preached in his land.

The reason for this is the change in the philosophy of government. In Nimrod's time, polytheism was a political creed; now, it only has the status of a limited religious creed. Government in the ancient world was generally based on a polytheistic foundation. Nimrod, like other monarchs of his day, was a figurehead of this system. He was meant to be an incarnation of the sun god, endowed with a supernatural right to rule over others. No modern ruler would base his rule on such a claim. Popular support, not supernatural strength, entitles a person to govern. That is why the pure message of tawhid (monotheism) would present no challenge to any ruler nowadays. For Nimrod and his contemporaries, on the other hand, it amounted to a cutting off of the very source of their power.

At the very outset of their missions, ancient prophets used to come up against the active resistance of the custodians of power. The prophets' preaching was anathema to them, for it directly contradicted the divine powers they claimed for themselves. The denial of these meant an end to their right to rule. The only way that anyone could be elevated to kingship in those days was by making himself out to be an offspring or incarnation of God. Any individual who introduced the teachings of monotheism to such a society appeared to be attacking the pillars of this polytheistic power structure. The establishment rose to resist the threat. With Islam, the world was shown that no human being is endowed with supernatural powers: God alone is the source of all strength. Islam proclaimed to the world the equality of human beings. It taught that no one has any inherent superiority over others. Political institutions were then separated from the realm of religious creeds. In the future, a ruler's power base would come from below from among the grassroots of popular opinion. Laying claim to celestial powers would no longer qualify a person to rule over others.

Similar was the case of the antique 'supernatural' doctors. If anyone intended to succeed as a physician in ancient times, he might well pretend that he had subdued occult forces and received knowledge about the mysteries of medicine from a supernatural source. Imagine that someone were to say, in such a society, that medicine was learnt, not from communion with supernatural sources but in medical colleges. The first people to oppose such a theory would be those who made a living out of “supernatural medicine.” Doctors in the modern age show very different reactions. Far from opposing the call to learn medicine in universities, they encourage it and follow the same practice.

The 7th century A.D. marked the beginning of a period of historical change, made possible by the Islamic revolution of the Prophet Muhammad. Now, that process of change is reaching its culmination. Preachers of true religion can call upon a mass of supporting evidence from within the range of human knowledge itself. Legal and social modifications have enabled the free and open preaching of religion. No Nimrod or Pharaoh can rise to stamp out the call of truth now. Massive inroads have been made into the world of nature, and our knowledge of how it functions has increased considerably. This knowledge provides solid intellectual support for the teachings of true religion. The ground, on which people who violently opposed the call to truth used to stand, has vanished from beneath their feet.

An enormous intellectual revolution, known as the scientific revolution, has occurred in modern times. The changes it has brought about in people’s outlook completely support the call for truth. If present opportunities are appropriately utilised, the domination of monotheistic thought can be established by appealing to people's good sense through written and spoken efforts. There is no need to resort to force of arms, as one had to in ancient times.

The scientific revolution of modern times is, in fact, a by-product of the Islamic revolution of the Prophet's time. Through the revolution brought about by the Prophet, God brought certain factors into play. A process of historical change, finally culminating in the scientific revolution of modern times, was initiated. While establishing the dominance of monotheistic thought over polytheism at the onset of the Islamic era, God also created factors that would later enable monotheism to triumph once more over atheistic and agnostic thought.

Before the coming of Islam, polytheistic thought had reigned supreme the world over. What polytheism comes down to is the worship of forms. The polytheistic urge in people used to make them turn in worship to any particularly striking or spectacular worldly phenomenon, whether it was the sun in the sky or the king on earth. For this reason, scientific research could not be conducted during the polytheistic era. As the historian Arnold Toynbee has pointed out, natural phenomena were considered objects of worship, so they could not possibly become objects of investigation. With Islam and the advance of monotheism, the awe in which worldly phenomena had been held collapsed.

People realized that all things besides God were objects of His creation. Therefore, there was no cause to consider worldly phenomena sacred: their natures could be analysed and investigated. The liberation of the human intellect, which Islam brought about, started at the beginning of the Islamic era, in the time of the Prophet. On the occasion of a lunar eclipse, the Prophet Muhammad pointed out that lunar and solar eclipses were signs of God. They were not signs of the birth or death of any human being, as had been thought during the age of superstition that preceded Islam. In this way, the Prophet refuted both human and material greatness, asserting the greatness of God alone. He initiated a trend in human thought, eventually reaching Europe and resulting in the modern scientific revolution.

One significant advantage of the Islamic revolution was that it ended the age of superstition. Superstition is basing one's beliefs on vague notions and speculations rather than on solid facts, as, for example, had been the case in pre-Islamic Arabia, when people thought that solar and lunar eclipses were a sign of the death of some great person. Superstition was the greatest obstacle to accepting Islam. A person whose mind is ruled by superstitious notions cannot objectively compare Islam with other creeds. Rather than judge matters based on real, tangible evidence, he accepts specific set ideas and rejects anything not in accord with them. Take, for instance, the historical aspect of religion. Anyone who objectively considers the historical credentials of Islam as compared with other religions will find that the authenticity of Islam cannot be doubted from a historical point of view; other religions, however, are shrouded in mystery and legend. But historical credibility was not considered an essential factor during the age of superstition, while the utmost importance is attached to it in our modern age. Higher criticism has now been given the status of a separate branch of learning. Its findings reveal conclusively that Islam is the only religion with impeccable historical credentials. Other religions are based more on myth than on real history.

The scientific mind sought to understand the universe in the light of experiments and observations. As a result of scientific research, mysteries of the universe which confirm Islamic teachings on a high intellectual level were unravelled. Human research has revealed, for instance, that throughout the entire universe, one law of nature applies. The same set of everlasting rules determines both celestial and terrestrial circumstances. This shows that the Lord of the Universe is one. If there were many gods, there would also be many laws.

Another obstacle to the acceptance of monotheism was ancient philosophy. In pre-Islamic times the minds of educated people were conditioned to think in philosophical terms. Philosophers have always sought to discover the ultimate reality, but five hundred years of glorious history has not brought them any nearer to their goal. The main reason has been the failure of philosophers to understand human limitations. Their efforts to comprehend ultimate reality were doomed because humans, with their limited intellectual capacity, could not fathom an infinite and unlimited reality. For this, prophetic wisdom is required, but humans' attachment to philosophical thinking has prevented them from responding positively to the message taught by prophets.

For centuries theologians, influenced by the predominant philosophical pattern of thought, sought to define and specify the basic tenets on which the whole concept of monotheism lies. What they failed to realize was that these are all unseen realities. Our present intellects are not geared to comprehend such facts fully. From a religious point of view, the most outstanding achievement of modern science has been to remove the mistaken notion that truth can be seen with one's eyes. Our range of understanding has been conclusively exposed as limited. Under the influence of science, philosophy has been forced to take second place, leaving science to guide our intellectual course. In the process, monotheism's path has been cleared. It has become clear—at least indirectly—that there is only one way left for us to discover reality: we must heed the prophets' call. People may still desire to see something before they believe it, but the philosophical frame they represent is on the defensive in today's scientific age. The demand to see invisible realities, like God, revelation and the world of eternity—the basics of monotheistic religion—has become academically untenable.

For the first time in known history, the inherent limitations in the scope of human knowledge have been conclusively established. Scientific research into the universe's mysteries has shown us one truth with staggering clarity: it lies beyond our limited intellect's powers to encompass the world of realities. This discovery is significant from an Islamic point of view, for it highlights the need for prophethood. On the one hand, we have scientists desperately anxious to understand the ultimate reality. On the other hand, we have those incapable of doing so due to built-in limitations. As a result, there is a vacuum in our spiritual makeup which only divine guidance, or prophethood, can fill. In acknowledging our intellectual limitations, science points, on a purely academic level, to the need for revelation. There is nothing else that can make up for what humanity lacks.

In ancient times, people were not generally allowed freedom of expression. The primary reason for this was the veneration in which monarchs and leading personalities were held. People who, for some reason, reached an elevated position in society used to be considered sacred and blessed. Their opinions were respected far above those of others. The inordinate awe in which they were held gave them the ability to force others to comply with their wishes. The monotheistic revolution of Islam laid waste to this myth of human greatness, putting all human beings on a level at par with each other. As a result, a new philosophical trend emerged, one that was finally to develop into democracy in western countries. One of the main principles of democracy is that all people are equal. It gives everyone the right to express their conscience in words or writing. Under the democratic system, preaching divine religion without fear of suppression or reprisal for the first time in history became possible.

Science has brought countless material blessings into the open, which had remained concealed from our sight for centuries. As far as Islamic preaching is concerned, the most important of these has been the development of modern methods of communication. The mass media, quick, efficient means of transport, the computer and video revolutions—all these things can be used to the advantage of Islam, enabling its teachings to be imparted to people on a universal scale.

These opportunities are highly conducive to the furtherance of the Islamic cause. At the beginning of the Islamic era, God had created—after a period lasting 2,500 years—conditions which would assist the establishment of Islamic dominance. So it is now. This process has continued over the last 1000 years, out of which conditions conducive to re-establishing Islamic dominance have emerged. There is no lack of opportunities, but they must be appropriately utilised to reap positive results. A dynamic community is needed for this task, one that can make the most of the opportunities available, as the Prophet and his Companions did with the opportunities available to them.

If a community of this nature emerges, it will not take long for Islamic dominance over atheistic and irreligious thought to be re-established, just as it was made to dominate over polytheism at the beginning of the Islamic era.

For over one hundred years, these possibilities have been awaiting a community of this nature, but unfortunately, no such community has emerged. True, countless Muslim groups and movements have sprung up over this period, but it has to be said that these groups have come into existence due to reactions to events. Political conditions have played a vital role in giving birth to them. What is needed, on the other hand, is a group of people intensely aware of the opportunities that God has created over the last one thousand years, a group that will fit in with God's scheme and exploit the complete range of possibilities that God has prepared for the resurgence of Islam that he desires.

One of the incidents during the Battle of Badr is related to the biographies of the Prophet as follows. The infidel force vastly outnumbered the Muslims. When their powerful army bore down on the Prophet and his companions, the Prophet—overwhelmed by the intensity of his own emotions—cast himself at the feet of his Lord. “Lord,” he cried, “if you destroy this group, you will never be worshipped again on earth.” This was no exaggeration on the Prophet's part. The fact was that those 313 souls who took the field at Badr were no ordinary group of people. Outwardly weak and ill-equipped, they represented the culmination of 2,500 years of history. A group like theirs is required today. The only ones who can make up such a group are people who are intensely aware of the divine scheme which has been developing over the last one thousand years and have set their hearts on playing their role in it; who is so strong and unwavering in their commitment to the task in hand that they will go to any lengths, and make any sacrifice, to see it through to completion. Such is the true “party of God.” And it is the party of God that shall triumph.<sup>201</sup>

In his book, History of the Arabs, Professor Philip K. Hitti has written that “after the death of the Prophet, sterile Arabia seems to have been converted as if by magic into a nursery of heroes the like of whom both in number and quality is hard to find anywhere.”<sup>202</sup>

For Islam to reign supreme in the world, people’s entire way of thinking has to change. Islamic thought has gained ascendancy over every other system of thought. This was the task that God chose the Prophet and his companions to perform, and its immensity should not be underestimated. If the Prophet’s successors could continue to perform this task, it was precisely because they had been reared in this “nursery of heroes”, for it was only after surmounting numerous hazardous obstacles that they succeeded in establishing the dominance of Islam over polytheistic thought. Today Islam has lost its former dominance—this time to atheistic thought. For its ascendancy to be re-established, another “nursery of heroes” must emerge. If the Prophet and his immediate successors were obliged to undergo such a rigorous initiation phase, his latter-day successors should show no reluctance to do likewise.

Just as the followers of the Prophet in his day suffered all kinds of privations and courted every danger to bring Islam into a position of supremacy in the world, so have Muslims of the present day engaged in titanic struggles for its restoration. They have sacrificed their lives and properties and expended time and energy on preparing literature and lectures supporting Islam; they have travelled great distances to further the Islamic cause. Regarding the quantum of effort, the struggle of present-day Muslims in the path of Islam has far surpassed that of the Prophet’s contemporaries and his immediate successors. But as far as results are concerned, the story is very different. While the efforts of the Prophet and his companions changed the whole course of human history, present-day Muslims’ efforts have only aggravated their plight.

This paradox stems from the differing psychologies that lay behind the struggle of the first Muslims on the one hand and that of modern Muslims on the other. While a sense of discovery moved the former, the latter has been driven by a sense of loss. For example, when the Quraysh sent two men to try to secure the return of those Muslims who had felt forced to emigrate to Abyssinia, the Negus (the King) called the Muslims to his court and questioned them about their religion. Ja'far's response provides a vivid picture of the feelings which moved the companions. He said: "O king, we were a people steeped in ignorance, worshipping idols, eating unsacrificed carrion, committing abominations, and the strong would devour the weak. Thus we were until God sent us a Messenger from out of our midst, one whose lineage we knew and his veracity, trustworthiness and integrity. He called us unto God that we should testify to his Oneness and worship Him, and renounce the stones and idols that our fathers and we had worshipped; and he commanded us to speak truly, to fulfil our promises, to respect the ties of kinship and the rights of our neighbours, and to refrain from crimes and bloodshed. So we worship God alone, setting nought beside Him, counting as forbidden what He has forbidden and as licit what He has allowed. For these reasons have, our people turned against us and have persecuted us for making us forsake our religion and revert from the worship of God to the worship of idols. That is why we have come to your country, having chosen you above all others, and we have been happy in your protection, and it is our hope, O king, that here, with you, we shall not suffer wrong."

We can see from Ja'far's words how much Islam meant to him and those on whose behalf he was speaking. Islam was, for them, a life of enlightenment as opposed to ignorance; it was a discovery of One God and abandonment of idols. They had abandoned an unruly life for a life of divine guidance, revealed to them through the Prophet Muhammad. They now sought eternity, not the world. Gone was the permissiveness of yesteryear; what they had discovered now was the joy of an upright moral bearing—the path of justice as opposed to oppression, of kindness as opposed to cruelty.

A sense of discovery imbues one with an unquenchable spirit, putting vitality into one's thoughts and an irresistible dynamism into one's actions. A sense of loss, on the contrary, dooms all one's efforts to failure. One plagued by such a feeling becomes incapable of constructive thought or action. A sense of discovery moved the first Muslims. That is why they produced an incomparable example of dynamic action. Modern Muslim movements have sprung from a feeling of loss, giving rise to an unprecedented saga of misconceived policies and ill-fated initiatives.

This sense of having lost out in life is a sentiment that their leaders unequivocally voice:

We have lost all our forefathers' legacy. Heaven has thrown us down from the high Pleiades to the earth.

Practically all Muslim movements of modern times have arisen out of this feeling of loss and persecution. But, of course, they may differ in how they put their point across. Some use the language of nationalistic politics, while others confine themselves to religious terminology. But, in essence, they are all the same, derived from a feeling of losing their past glory.

When the Greek mathematician Archimedes (287-212 B.C.) discovered the law of specific gravity, his ebullience knew no bounds. He quite literally forgot himself in the joy of his discovery. In more recent times, the Shah of Iran had lost just his throne, but this purely material loss deprived him of even the will to live. Such is the nature of both discovery and loss. All one sees is the object that one has discovered or lost.

Without doubt, a feeling of discovery engenders positive character. The noble manner in which the Muslims of the first phase conducted their affairs resulted from their positivity. They bowed down before the truth. They were magnanimous enough to acknowledge other people's contributions; they were true to their words. They had the courage to forgive others. They could rise above feelings of complaint. They had the strength to make purely rational decisions. They could think objectively by rising above the psychology of reaction.

In contrast to this, a sense of loss produces a negative psychology. People guided by their emotions and impulses rather than principles naturally fall victim to hatred and resentment. A lack of realism dominates their attitude towards others. They are constantly engaged in differences and dissension. They fail to acknowledge the truth. They are not ready to accept their defeat. Owing to their negative mentality, even their successes soon turn into failures. This is the reason for the marked difference between the results of the movements launched by present-day Muslims and those of the early phase.

The revolution brought about by the Prophet of Islam resulted from positive ethics. If Muslims want to produce the same result while guided by negative ethics, they should have to find another God—for it is not God's will that this should happen. They should also have to find another prophet—for that was not the way of the Prophet.
